Then, after the formula of the Master, lay hands upon them and pray for them. And if the minister think proper, it would afford a fitting opportunity to address the parents and the church on their respective duties in the premises; and while they are returning to their places, let the following hymn be sung:

1 Saviour, who thy flock art feeding,
  With the shepherd's kindest care,
All the feeble gently leading,
  While the lambs thy bosom share;

2 Now, these little ones receiving,
  Fold them in thy gracious arm;
There, we know, the Word believing
  Only there, secure from harm.

3 Never from thy pasture roving,
  Let them be the lion's prey:
Let thy tenderness, so loving,
  Keep them all life's dangerous way.

4 Then, within thy fold eternal,
  Let them find a resting place;
Feed on pastures ever vernal,
  Drink the rivers of thy grace.

Try that, I say, a few times, and test it, whether it does effectively and effectually testify to the truth and the propriety of the Master's wisdom, both to the heart of the Pastor and to the hearts of his people. They will see and feel, that it is precisely what the blessed Saviour designed, and what he, himself, carried out, as an example for them to imitate. It will prove, I am confident, just the external manifestation which every regenerate heart desires to express of their internal sense of beauty and good, and likewise the proper acknowledgement to our gracious Redeemer for this kind provision of his goodness.

Why it is not duly administered, generally, and especially by the Baptists, has always been an inexplicable mystery to me, unless it be the fear of appearing to symbolize in a measure with the error of the Pædobaptists. It is a pity that they are not afraid of other contamination, from other doctrines and practices they hold in common with them. Truth must be embraced, however much perverted and abused by others, for it can only be made beautiful, by shaking off the dust and rust of a superstitious age, which has covered it with a dark and repulsive coat. While the Baptists continue to exclude so essential an element from the Redeemer's economy, they must suffer immense damage as a denomination, and bear the odium of casting off, or treating as nought, this source of prosperity, so wisely ordained by the only Lawgiver in Zion. "It is impossible, (says Chapin, in his View of the Organization and Order of the Primitive Church,) for us to see how any servant of Christ can drive from his altar, and reject from his covenant, those to whom He extended his blessings, while on earth, and of whom he said, 'Of such is the kingdom of God.'"

Before bringing to a close my remarks, hastily thrown together in hurried moments of limited leisure from anxious responsibilities and distracting cares, and attended with constant and perplexing interruptions, I must add, that I deny the validity, in toto, of all observances, as church ordinances, for which we have not an explicit scriptural injunction or example; and that I not only repudiate but deprecate all extra scriptural ordinances, rites, and ceremonies, as wholly "the inventions of men." Therefore, in urging the dedication of children unto the Lord, I advocate no more than that for which we have an explicit "thus saith the Lord," and an express, unmistakable example. Less than his precept I regard as derelict and culpable as supererrogation. "No more, nor less, nor otherwise, than the example," is the only safe, the only correct rule. Let God be true, though it make every man a liar.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, March 24, 1853.

"ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF THE SABBATH."

The discourse of the Rev. Dr. Smith upon this subject, in the Jane-st. Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church, on the 13th inst., was one of those specimens of theological charlatanry, of which there have been oft repeated exhibitions for the last three hundred years. We say this without the least disposition to impeach his sincerity; on the contrary, we suppose he meant well, and it is quite likely, that he thought he had made himself master of the subject. It is a pity, however, that men of good intentions and respectable talents should be so blind to the irreconcilable contradictions of their own system.

Full half of the discourse was occupied in refuting the argument of Paley, that the Sabbath was first instituted, not in Paradise, but in the Wilderness of Sin. Exod. 16. It was well to take some notice of the argument, perhaps, but we thought that the speaker spent entirely too much time upon it. We judge that some of his sleepy hearers thought so too. Paley's argument serves to prop a falling creed, but it has a very slight hold upon the convictions of sober, common-sense people. The plain, unsophisticated reader, finding it written, "God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it," naturally concludes that these words mean something; he believes the meaning to be, that God set apart the day for a holy use, and rendered it a day peculiarly happy for man. For it were contrary to all reason to suppose, that God proposed to render homage to himself, or to bless himself. And though Paley argue, that God's resting on the seventh day, at the close of creation, was the reason why he blessed and sanctified it for the Israelites in the wilderness, a man of common sense cannot very well understand why that reason was not just as good in the beginning, as it was twenty-five hundred years afterward. Paley's argument is as flimsy as a cobweb, and finds no response in the conscience of a God-fearing man.

After disposing of Paley, and glancing at the scriptural allusions to the Sabbath in the Patriarchal Age, the lecturer dwelt upon the institution as embodied in the Jewish Dispensation. He brought it down to the Christian Era, and showed that our Saviour himself honored the institution, holding him up in this respect (so we thought) as an example for his followers. But lo! a new tack is suddenly taken. His followers, instead of imitating his example, are found, immediately after his resurrection, in the observance of the first day of the week! And, according to the lecturer, they continued to do so from that time onward. One would have supposed, from his statements, that the observance of the seventh day bacame suddenly obsolete, and that the numerous references to it as the Sabbath, in Acts of Apostles, (see chaps. 13: 14, 27, 42, 44; 16: 13; 17: 2; 18: 4,) meant nothing at all. True, the lecturer spoke of the first day of the week as if it were identical with the old Sabbath, differing from it only in a small circumstance; but, in so doing, he not only placed himself at variance with truth, and with all just rules of logic, but appropriated to the first day of the week a name which the above-mentioned passages uniformly appropriate to the seventh. Does open, honest-faced truth, require such craftiness? If the references in the Book of Acts to the Sabbath are to the day which had always been observed as such, then Sabbath is the inspired name given to the seventh day of the week, notwithstanding the resurrection is past. And when man robs the seventh day of this inspired name, and appropriates it to another day, he exhibits a presumption which deserves rebuke.

The advocates of Sunday sanctification, however, dare not conform their language to the inspired pattern; it would be fatal to their cause. Had they never given the name Sabbath to the first day of the week, the Sunday observance would not now be any more strict in Great Britain and America, than it is in the most purely Catholic countries. Had they always given it to the seventh day, according to the Scripture pattern, there would be twenty Sabbatarians where there is now one. We repeat it, they dare not conform their language to the Scriptures. All their hope of success rests upon keeping up the cheat that the designation of Sunday as the Sabbath rests upon inspired authority. They dare not tell the people to the contrary.

But why did not the Rev. Doctor tell his auditors something about the observance of the seventh day of the week by Christians? Can he who undertook to give the "Origin and History of the Sabbath," be ignorant of the fact, that Christians did observe the seventh day, even for hundreds of years after the Lord's resurrection? He was very careful to give as copious quotations from the old Fathers as possible, showing that Sunday had obtained an honorable distinction among their Church Festivals—a thing that no well-informed person disputes—but the quotations that might have been made in behalf of the Sabbath were wisely let alone. Well, we trust the day will come when the teachers of the people will be willing to look at both sides of the question.

The next lecture of the course, as given in the programm which we published last week, will be "The Jewish and Christian Sabbath," by the Rev. Dr. Potts. It will have been de livered before our paper goes to press, but we shall not be able to furnish any notice of it this week. We intend to hear it, if possible.

Sunday Movements—Jewish Disabilities—Popery—The Pope and the Emperor.

Glasgow, March 4th, 1853.

Next week the Crystal Palace Company's Bill will be considered by a Select Committee of the House of Commons. Whether a clause for the Sunday opening will be then inserted or considered, seems a matter of uncertainty. If not then proposed, the clause will be submitted, it is presumed, in the Committee of the Whole House—although a doubt has been expressed as to whether this can be done before the Easter recess. Government, as at present constituted, has not expressed any opinion, or indicated what part they may take, collectively, in regard to the opening. When the Committee of the Working Men's Movement, organized to procure its being so opened, waited on Lord Palmerston, now Home Secretary, he heard them with attention, promised to give the matter his best attention, and expressed the pleasure he would feel in presenting their petition to the House of Commons. Meanwhile, opposing petitions are being forwarded from all parts of the country, from congregations, presbyteries, and synods of the church. In this effort, however, the supporters of Sunday sometimes fail. It is stated that the ministers of Sheerness met privately, and, instead of calling a public meeting, deemed it more prudent to submit for signature a petition purporting to be from the working men of the locality. But the working men, dissatisfied with the object of that petition, and also with its origin, did themselves convene a public meeting, to which they invited the ministers, some of whom did attend. After considerable discussion, and the proposal of three different motions, a resolution was adopted to petition Parliament in favor of the Sunday opening of the Crystal Palace.

Our Glasgow Improvements Bill, with a clause against Sunday trading, with a view to protect the church's holiday more perfectly than the law of the land does, has been withdrawn, in consequence of the Bill's being otherwise so faulty. And the delay of a year may render more difficult the insertion of such a clause, as Sunday desecration progresses. There are now fifteen omnibuses plying every Sunday—extending farther their range, and making, we believe, less pretension that they are only for the accommodation of churchgoers. On Sunday, 20th ultimo, it was calculated that 42,000 persons were engaged in skating, sliding, &c., in the parks of London. More than fifty fell through the ice, at different times.

In the House of Commons, the Jewish Disabilities Bill—rendering unnecessary, in the case of Jewish members, the oath, "on the true faith of a Christian"—was read for the first time, this week. When Lord John Russell previously moved for a Committee of the House with this object, the majority of 234 against 205 was understood to give a pretty distinct intimation of the success of the measure in the Commons. But as a similar motion has repeatedly been carried in that House, and yet been rejected by the Lords, the success of the measure is far from being secure.

Lord John Russell has now resigned the office of Foreign Secretary into the hands of Lord Clarendon, for whom it was understood to be designed. As regards Papal States on the Continent, it is generally feared that his Lordship will prove a less decided protester against inroads on Christian liberty than Lord Palmerston was, while he held that office. Indeed, with several Papists in the Cabinet, it is not easy to see how there can be any very decided measures taken against the encroachments of Popery. Of avowed members of that apostacy, we have Mr. Sadler, a Lord of the Treasury; Mr. Monsell, Clerk of the Ordnance; and Mr. Keogh, Solicitor General. If these men are consistent, or, rather, if Pope or Cardinals deem it safe so to enjoin, they must do their utmost to thwart any measure tending to check the intrigues of their church. But Pope and Cardinals may permit, for a time, what they wholly disapprove—as the good of Mother Church does not require that truth or honesty be followed or adhered to. The records of history furnish numberless examples of the crooked policy which seeks to make the end sanctify the means; and in our own times the same course continues to be followed. In illustration, I fear, we might point to the case of priest Forbes, of Glasgow, whose letter, renouncing the errors of Popery, we some months ago had occasion to notice. In the Popish paper published here, he has just intimated his return to that fold, not only under circumstances, but with expressions which, in the circumstances, render doubtful his sincerity in the whole matter. His soul loathes herself now—and that loathing probably led him formerly to devise means for its misrepresentation, which may be expected to follow.

The Pope, it is announced, has agreed to come to Paris to crown the new Emperor. He is to remain there two months, but competent judges may be permitted to question whether there be security for the crown remaining so long on the imperial head—even if held there by both hands of his miscalled Holiness. Married, civilly and religiously, and anointed with Pope-made oil, the fugitive of former days may deem his position made thus more secure. And as he has ostentatiously announced that the new Empress (though of Scottish extraction) is of the faith that bows before the Virgin, the priesthood will lend him all the aid they can—so long as he, in return, gives to them imperial patronage. But there is, nevertheless, One above, who controls all events, and who, in his Word, hath foretold the overturning of thrones till He come whose right all dominion is.

NEW ENGLAND BAPTIST CONVENTION.

The New England Baptist Convention was held at Boston, agreeable to appointment, on the 8th inst., and was full of interest. Its deliberations and results are summed up as follows by a correspondent of The Independent:

"It has resulted in the establishment of an Historical Society, bearing the name of "Backus," the design of which is to collect and preserve documents, known to exist, of interest and importance to the denomination. Reports were made upon the condition of Baptist Academies in the New England States, from which it appears that in Maine there were none under the direct supervision of the Baptists, but that of the sixty endowed by the Legislature, there were some ten or twelve of whose trustees the majority are Baptists. In New Hampshire, a convention had recently been held to take measures for the establishment of a classical school of high character, and it was expected that an endowment of twenty-five thousand dollars would be raised within the State of New Hampshire. In Vermont there are four academies under the patronage of the denomination. In Massachusetts reports were made respecting three institutions. In Connecticut an academy has existed for twenty years at Suffield, the trustees of which are chosen by the Baptist Education Society, once in three years. No report was made from the State of Rhode Island, there being no academies in that State under the special supervision of the Baptists. The two colleges belonging to the denomination are Brown University and Waterville College. The president of the first-named, Rev. Dr. Wayland, made a report respecting that institution, which awakened some discussion. He said their endeavor had been to lay out a course of study suited to the peculiar wants of Baptists, who, he maintained, belonged to the middle class. Their great aim, therefore, should be to elevate the masses. He said that the changes recently introduced in that college had been attended with most encouraging success. The number of students, who have entered the last year, has doubled. Dr. Wayland said that their plan was to furnish instruction for all classes of society. He mentioned the case of a young man, a farmer, who had spent a year with them, and had made great acquisitions. Prof. Chase, of the department of Analytical Chemistry, had given a course of lectures to the jewelers of Providence, between three and four hundred jewelers attending them.

"Prof. Champlin gave a favorable account of the condition and prospects of Waterville College. The College sustains a president and four professors, and during the last thirty years some three hundred students have graduated, from a quarter to a third of whom have become ministers.

"The Convention bestowed considerable time upon the subject of Theological Education, the result of which was a recommendation of the plan of establishing a Theological Institution in Vermont, to meet the wants of a class of young men desirous of pursuing a shorter course of literary and theological study. The institution at Newton having been modified to meet the wants of the same class, and its Board of Trustees having been opened to the annual election of members by the Northern Baptist Education Society, it was recommended to the sympathy and support of the churches."

CALIFORNIA GOLD-HUNTING.

The large amount of gold received last week from California, and the announcement that the "miners are very successful," will doubtless increase the already too high California fever. If those in whom it rages could stand on one of our docks when a steamer arrives, and see the returned Californians debark, we fancy that the effect would be cooling. Some of those who return present pictures of disappointment and suffering such as are to be seen nowhere else. And then to hear their stories of unrequited labor and abused confidence, is enough to make one's heart ache. We recently met a returned Californian, who expressed the opinion, that of those whom he had met during a two-years residence in that country, nine-tenths would have been better off pecuniarily if they had staid at home; and he knew of thousands there who would sell the last rag from their backs to raise money enough to pay their passage home. What folly, for those who are now comfortably situated, to break up existing arrangements, and expose themselves to the inconveniences and dangers of a long sea voyage and change of climate, with this bare possibility of improving their pecuniary condition.

An intelligent correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, writing from Marysville, under date of Feb. 10, gives the following results of his experience and observation in gold-hunting:

"I came to this country with a party of acquaintances, all working men, and, at the time of leaving home, all in good health. We took passage by the mail steamer, were thirty-five days in reaching San Francisco, and lost by death one-sixth of our number. In our company were several old miners, who had been here before and had been successful, but in the time of their absence the prospect for mining had so changed that they traveled a month or more, at an expense of some hundreds of dollars, before they decided upon a location. When that was done, it was, for two months, too dry to accomplish anything at mining, and then it rained almost constantly for six or eight weeks, flooding nearly all the diggings in the country, and retarding very materially all mining operations. Since the weather has become pleasant, they have been making about five dollars a day to the man, which is probably quite up to the average of miners' wages, and is, even for this country, doing very well. But, take from that the cost of a claim, tools, provisions, and clothing, it will require a long time to make up the expense of the journey here, and leave them worth as much money as they would have been if they had remained at home. Some of our party have worked at mining all the available time through the winter, and paid out no money but what was necessary, and are out of pocket from twenty to fifty dollars each man.

"From conversations I have held with miners, I have no doubt but this short narrative will fit the case of hundreds of similar parties that have come to this country during the past season.

"Wages for mining cannot be quoted at more than four dollars a day without board, and almost any number of men could be procured at that price. The expense of board through the winter has ranged from ten to fourteen dollars a week, although a man with a cabin of his own, may board himself for something less. But adding the expense of cabin, provision, and clothing, and subtracting the rainy days, the sum is left open for cyphering. This calculation is for a well man; if he should be taken sick, and have to pay a doctor five or ten dollars a visit, cyphering will not make his account good. He must work for that when he gets well, if he is not so fortunate as to have the funds on hand, or pay the debt along with one we all owe to nature, which is not an unusual manner of settling accounts at the diggings."

Letters from our Missionaries.—By the ship Nestorian, from Shanghae, which arrived at New York last week, we received letters from our missionary brethren Carpenter and Wardner, dated Nov. 7. Alluding to changes in the missionary families at Shanghae, Mrs. Carpenter says:—

"It is not yet a year since Mrs. Lockhart and her children, with Miss Phillips, went home. A month or so after, Dr. Bridgeman and wife, Mrs. Boone, Mrs. Dr. Taylor, and their children, went; and a few weeks ago Bishop Boone. Last week Mr. Jenkins and family went; and this week goes Dr. Burton and Mr. and Mrs. Byers, (the two latter came out on the same ship which takes them home; Mr. B. has been here about two months, and his health has failed so rapidly that he must return at once.) Next week Mr. Shuck and his family leave; and next February Mr. and Mrs. Syle expect to go with their family. Then we shall have but two missionary families, (Dr. Medhurst and Mr. McClatchie,) and two other persons, (Dr. Lockhart and Miss Jones,) of all who were in the field when we came here."

Bro. Carpenter writes:—

"We are in usual health, and never felt more interested in our work, though we see no signs of a speedy harvest."

Church Organized at Dakota, Wis.—Under date of Dakota, Wis., March 1, 1853, Bro. C. P. Rood writes: "Eld. Todd, of Berlin, has been laboring with us for a time past, and his labors have been blessed to the conversion of sinners, the reclaiming of backsliders, and the strengthening of the brethren and sisters. Elds. Todd and O. P. Hull organized a Seventh-day Baptist Church at this place on the 13th day of the 2d month, 1853, consisting of ten members. Four were baptized, and will join the church when Eld. Todd visits us again. Others are expected soon to unite with us, both by letter and baptism. One family, also one married lady and a young man, have recently commenced keeping the Sabbath of the Lord. There are at present ten Sabbath-keeping families here, and two more will be here soon. For the past two years we have sustained meetings and a Sabbath-School. I have attempted to get up a list of subscribers for the Sabbath-School Visitor, but have failed in consequence of the scarcity of money. O that some brother whom the Lord has blessed with abundance would send us the Visitor."

Revival at Verona, N. Y.—A letter from Bro. Martin Wilcox gives us the particulars of an interesting work of grace in the first Seventh-day Baptist Church at Verona, Oneida Co., N. Y. Meetings were held nearly every evening, and on each Sabbath and First-day, for between four and five weeks, closing about the 7th inst. They were conducted by Eld. Joshua Clarke of Brookfield, and Eld. Christopher Chester, pastor of the church. The church generally, and the surrounding community, have been greatly revived; about forty persons, it is hoped, have been converted; and twenty or thirty more, who have been awakened, are inquiring what they shall do to be saved. Twenty-seven have been baptized, most of whom have joined the Seventh-day Baptist Church. Meetings are now held every other evening, and the work is still going on. Bro. Wilcox mentions, as an interesting feature of these meetings, their deep solemnity and freedom from every thing like animal excitement.

Revival at Hayfield, Pa.—Eld. Ray Green writes us in relation to a pleasant religious interest in Hayfield, Pa., and vicinity. The Methodists and Seventh-day Baptists united in a protracted meeting, which resulted in a general revival of professors of religion, and the hopeful conversion of some forty persons. The work has spread through Hayfield and a part of Cussewago. Bro. Green mentions one place where evening meetings were held for prayer, conference, and preaching, at which several of the young people had made a profession of religion.

Tragical End of a Home Missionary.—The Home Mission Record learns from Rev. T. R. Cressy, that Rev. Elisha S. Terry, a missionary of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society, among the Chippeway Indians, on Red River, was barbarously murdered, a short time since. As he was going one day to the woods to cut a stick of timber, singing, as he passed along, a hymn in the Chippeway language, he was pierced through the body with arrows, from the bows of a band of Sioux Indians, who were lying in ambush, and was afterwards scalped.

The Church of Scio.—Resolved, That the non-resident members of the Church of Scio, Allegany Co., N. Y., shall be considered as dismissed, unless they wish to hold their standing, and communicate the same, by letter or otherwise, within one year from date.

Done by order of the Church,

Dec. 26, 1852.

Ministers in the West.—The following statement of the inadequate support and necessary self-denial of many Western ministers, is suited to awaken interest and prayer in their behalf:—

"Nine out of ten of our young ministers in the West begin the ministry in debt for their education; have consequently very little to begin with, unless they should get it with a wife, which always subjects them to embarrassment in another way, if the wife is not much more than ordinarily prudent. The maximum salary of Western missionaries and village pastors is $400 instead of $500. Out of this they must contrive to pay the interest, if not the principal, of old debts; $50 to $75 house rent; purchase and keep a horse and cow; provide for all the 'little responsibilities' of life, and do more at public entertainment than any one if not all the rest of the parish! The poverty and scantiness of living of many of these dear brethren and self-sacrificing sisters, are known only to themselves and their sympathizing Saviour."

An Illustration of Slavery.—The following paragraph from a New Orleans paper furnishes the most striking illustration of slavery that we have lately seen:—

"Chauncey B. Blake was brought before Recorder Baldwin, charged with tampering with slaves. It was proved that he was seen conversing with a number of them in the street, that he asked them if they could read and write, and if they would like to have a Bible. This was the amount of the testimony against him. In palliation of his conduct, it was shown that he was a regular appointed agent of the Bible Society in New Orleans, to distribute the Bible to such as would accept it. The Society, however, disclaimed having the most distant intention of giving the Scriptures to slaves, and it was said that Blake had exceeded his commission in offering it. But, as it appeared to be a misunderstanding on his part, and not intentional interference, he was discharged with a caution not to repeat the offense."

Juvenile Asylum.—From the Report of the New York Juvenile Asylum, we learn that the $50,000 required by the act of incorporation has been contributed, and the Board of Supervisors have appropriated a like sum, making $100,000, to be expended for a permanent location and buildings. The collection of $50,000 entitles the Asylum to receive from the City, or from the Commissioners of Emigration, a yearly sum of $40 for each and every pupil kept and instructed by it. A house of reception has been taken in a central position, and will be opened the 1st of May—also a suitable building on the East River, above the Shot-Tower, will be occupied as a temporary Asylum for boys till an eligible site for a permanent institution can be obtained.

Mortality in New York.—We have received the City Inspector's Report for 1852—a pamphlet of 321 pages—from which we learn that the total number of deaths reported for interment during the year 1852 was 21,601. Of these 1,630 are still-born, and 140 died from old age. The number of male adults was 4,570, female adults 4,085; male children 7,289, female children 5,657. Compared with the previous year, the statistics of mortality show an increase of 644 deaths from disease alone. The aggregate, divided into periods, stands thus: Average each month, 1,800; each week, 415; each day, 59.

A Sensible Rapper.—The editor of the Palmer Journal has been mixing with a circle of rappers, and made a dollar and a half out of the operation, as follows:—

"We accepted an invitation to a sitting of a circle of spiritualists, the other evening, and were not a little surprised when the following message was spelled out to one of the company: 'Pay the Printer!' It was subsequently explained through a 'medium,' that the message was from the spirit of a delinquent subscriber, who owed us a dollar and a half. The friends of the departed paid us without hesitation, and the joy of a relieved spirit was manifested by raps, tipping the table, &c."

Grounds of Dismission.—A council of nine ministers and five delegates lately called by the First Congregational church of Austinburg, Ohio, unanimously advised the dismission of the pastor, Rev. J. H. Avery, on the ground of "a want of sympathy between the church and pastor," and that "his labors have not been adapted to secure the edification and spiritual fructification of the church." They also express their sympathy with the church in their trials. So says the Independent.

Catholic Missions.—Within the last six months, the Society for Propagating the Faith in France, one of the principal missionary centers of the Roman Catholic church, has sent out 18 missionaries to Asia, 7 to China, 2 to Cochin China, 1 to Thibet, 4 to Pondicherry, 2 to Tonquin, 1 for Siam, and 1 for Meyssone.

Sunday Labor.—The police of Brooklyn are trying to put a stop to Sunday labor. We learn from one of the daily papers, that a man was arrested there last Sunday for washing a carriage in violation of the city ordinance.

The Baptists of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have renounced government aid to their college. The Presbyterians in Nova Scotia, corresonding to the Scotch Seceders, were the first party to denounce such aid; the Congregationalists, when they commenced their college at Liverpool, were the second; and now the Baptists, chiefly by the influences of New Brunswick, are the third. The friends of the college now hope to raise $10,000 for an endowment.

It costs thirty-five millions of dollars to pay the salaries of American lawyers; twelve millions of dollars are paid out annually to keep our criminals; ten millions of dollars to keep the dogs among us alive; while only six millions of dollars are spent annually to keep the sixteen thousand ministers in the United States. Yes, and it costs more than all these put together to pay the salaries of the rum-sellers.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

An Editorial Convention is to be held at Marshall, in Michigan, early in June. Although the Editors of the Peninsular State are notorious for their ultraism in politics, on such an occasion as this they meditate burying the hatchet, and to renew old acquaintances, and form new ones, without regard to political differences. They have 50 or 60 presses in Michigan now. At every county seat there is to be found at least one press, and where the demand justifies it, two presses. Detroit has three dailies, and the prospectus of the fourth, a penny paper, has just been issued. Several weekly and monthly publications are published in the City of the Straits.

The Protestant Missionary Society of Basle has recently sent out three missionaries to labor on the west coast of Africa. A letter from Stuttgard, dated Nov. 11, says the same society were about to send out "a young black woman of Africa, named Pauline Fatime, who was for some years servant in the house of Baron de Muller, of Basle, to propagate Christianity among the black women in Egypt. It is said that she is the first negro woman to whom such a mission has been intrusted."

The Wardens and Vestry of St. Paul's Church, Boston, have unanimously voted to proffer to their Rector, Rev. Dr. Vinton, a leave of absence for six months, to enable him to visit Europe, at such time during the present year as may suit his pleasure, and moreover, to continue his salary, and supply the pulpit during that period, and to present him with a sum amply sufficient to pay all the expenses of his journey.

Rev. Hugh Stowell, in the course of a lecture on "Habit," which he gave to the members of the Manchester Young Men's Christian Association, recently, denounced the practice of tobacco-smoking is unmeasured terms. He said: "Never myself will I hire a curate who indulges in it. I never now make inquiries for a curate, but I invariably inquire, is he a smoker of tobacco; if he is, I instantly reject his application."

The Wyoming Seminary, at Kingston, near Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, took fire March 14. The south end of the building was all destroyed with its contents, except a portion of the instruments. The valuable library was burned, and the 300 pupils were unable to save any of their books or clothing. The Institution was under the charge of Rev. R. Nelson, and the loss amounts to $21,000—insured for $7,500.

A North Carolina correspondent of the New York Recorder, says the church in Elizabeth City, and others in its neighborhood, call the roll of membership at each monthly conference, and absentees are required to give an excuse. If a member is absent nine consecutive meetings, he ceases to be a member of the church, unles she can give a satisfactory reason for his absence.

A man who lived far from the sanctuary once complained to his minister of the distance, while many others had but a few steps to walk to enjoy divine ordinances. "Never mind," said the good pastor; "remember that every Sabbath you have the privilege of preaching a sermon six miles long. All the residents and people you pass, you preach the gospel to."

Miss Morse, of the Baptist mission in Siam, mentions the hopeful conversion of three Siamese men and one woman, and says that there is now for the first time a Siamese prayer-meeting, conducted by Siamese brethren. A female prayer-meeting was commenced some time since.

The late Amos Lawrence, of Boston, gave away, during his life, more than five hundred thousand dollars! On his pocket-book was inscribed the following words: "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

The town of St. Anthony, situated at the Falls of the same name, though young in years, has seven or eight organized churches, and a minister for every one hundred inhabitants, a larger proportion of ministers to the population than any town in the Union.

The Church of St. John, in Liverpool, was, towards the close of last month, the scene of an impressive public ceremony—six adult converts renouncing the Romish communion, and declaring their adhesion to the Church of England. The building was crowded by a most attentive audience.

The following missionaries recently embarked from Boston for Smyrna, in the Edisto, Capt. Kendrick: Rev. William Bird and his wife, Dr. Fayette Jewett and his wife, and Miss Sarah Cheeney. Dr. and Mrs. Jewett expect to reside at Tocat, in connection with the Armenian mission; and the others are to join the Syria mission.

The largest State Temperance Convention ever held in Rhode Island assembled at Providence March 15. The proceedings were exceedingly spirited, and after two sessions during the day, Howard Hall was filled to overflowing in the evening.

A collection was taken up in the Rev. Dr. Alexander's church, in the city of New York, on the first Sunday of the year, for the cause of Foreign Missions, amounting to $3,158 45. They had just entered a new house of worship.

Andrew Fuller says that the poor people of Glasgow used to say: "David Dale gives his money by sho'elfuls, and God Almighty sho'els it back again." David Dale was a Baptist pastor, and at the same time a manufacturer and banker.

Mazzini is said to have escaped from Italy on board of an English frigate at Genoa.

Dispatches announce the conclusion of the warlike difficulties between Austria and Turkey, and that a diplomatic Conference, to be held at Paris, is to definitely settle the matters in dispute. This result may be attributed to English diplomacy.

The man who tried to kill the Austrian Emperor has been shot; the Emperor's wound is said to be more serious than was at first reported.

California News.

Two weeks later news from California was received in New York March 15th. The news is to Feb. 16, and was brought from San Francisco by steamer California.

The aggregate shipment of gold dust for the middle of February is stated at $3,790,000. The largest previous shipment was made by the Panama, on the 30th of November last, which was a few dollars over $2,682,000. The Tennessee took out, on the 1st Feb., $2,430,000, which, added to the present shipment, will make the aggregate for this month, $5,220,558.

The events of the fortnight are not of a striking or exceedingly interesting character. The weather may be said to have fairly settled down into the spring season, and business of every character has been steadily improving. The roads from the trading points at the head of the various streams to the mining districts are now in a traveling condition, and large quantities of provisions and necessaries of life find their way to the remotest canon. Prices of provisions have in consequence fallen at those points from 50 to 75 per cent.

An extensive claim to land in the City of San Francisco has just been made by a native Californian, named Jose Ives Lemuntour. The Farralones, Yerba Ruena, Alcatras and other Islands in and about the bay, are embraced in the claim, which is said to have been granted in 1843. Should the claimant ever succeed in his title, two-thirds of San Francisco will be tributary to his coffers.

The new clipper ship Flying Fish, Capt. Nickels, arrived on Monday, after a remarkably short passage of ninety-two days from New York. It has been just ten months and fifteen days since she left this port, during which time she has made the voyage around the world by way of China and the East Indies, taken in her cargo at New York, and reached this place again.

A miner at French Camp determined to leave for his Atlantic home, and with that view was about to abandon his claim. Being detained a day, he employed the time at work, and luckily striking a "pocket," took from it a piece of gold weighing 271 oz. The lucky finder left next day.

At the Big Bar of the Cosumnes, on Tuesday, in the day time, a party of five Mexicans attacked a Chinese camp, and killed six Chinamen, and robbed them of over $6,000. The Mexicans were supposed to be a party of Joaquin's, headed by Joaquin himself, and were pursued by a party of Mexicans through Jackson to the Butte, where at last accounts all traces of them were lost.

At the lower Ranch Gulch, on the Calaveras River, a party of Chinamen entered a miner's tent and commenced an assault on the inmates. One, who was cooking, was fired at, and another, lying on the bed reading, was severely stabbed in several places. The wounds are not fatal.

A party of miners left their camp on the Rich Gulch, in pursuit of the Chinamen who committed the above outrage. They fell in with one of them, and immediately strung him up.

A party of three—two Americans and one German—left Murphy's some time since, en route for Australia. Near French Camp, last Sunday, three bodies were discovered, secreted in a hole and covered with bushes. On examination, it was discovered that they were the bodies of the above-mentioned persons. These persons had a good sum of money with them, and had evidently been killed for it.

The brig Vandalia, for Columbia, Oregon, was lost on the bar at the entrance of the river. Four bodies were washed ashore, one of which was recognized as Capt. Beard.

Oregon papers of the 29th Jan. have reached us. The weather had become mild, after a severe winter. The loss of cattle and horses, by the floods and snow storms, is said to be enormous.

A PICTURE OF IMTEMPERANCE.—On Monday evening, March 14, Officer Sleeper, of South Boston, arrested a woman named Williams, who was fighting in Second-st. She was quite intoxicated, and was committed to the Watch-House. In about an hour after the commitment, the husband of the woman brought to the Watch-House his three children, respectively four years, two years, and three weeks of age. The infant was crying for its mother, the second was shivering with cold, while the oldest seemed to be suffering from some illness, and was perfectly stupid and insensible. The youngest was appeased when given to its mother, the second soon became warm and comfortable. The oldest grew more ill, and a physician was at last ordered by the officer of the watch. Dr. Sprague attended, and discovered that the child had partaken of a quantity of rum. Emetics were applied, and for an hour the child vomited incessantly, and for a time it was feared that it would not recover. It finally partially recovered, and the whole family were conveyed home. It was supposed that the little girl obtained the rum, during the absence of her mother, from a bottle left on the side-board. The girl, as she lay dead drunk, presented a most affecting appearance. She was very handsome, and as she groaned in agony, with eyes fixed in her head, disheveled ringlets about her face, her countenance pale and cold as death, and the mother who should be watching over her, crazy drunk in a cell in the west room, the scene was most sickening.

A fugitive slave was arrested in Madison County, Illinois, a short time ago, and after a hearing of the case before the Commissioner, it was ordered that she be given up to the claimant. The owner of the woman offered to release all title to his property, provided the sum of $1200 was paid him. The amount was soon raised by the citizens of Alton, and the young woman is now free. An Alton paper gives the following particulars of the case:—

"Thirteen months since, a young man arrived at Alton with this woman; he had run away with her from Memphis, where she was owned by his father, a Mr. Leach. Some family difficulty had occurred, and he brought her up here, and left her, telling her that she was now free, which she in her simplicity believed.

"The girl lived here quietly, and married young Chavres, three weeks since. An old woman in this place had formerly lived in Memphis, and in writing to her friends there she casually inquired how Amanda came by her freedom. Everybody here supposed the girl was free. This gave information in Memphis of her whereabouts to two negro traders by the name of McCullum, and they went to her owner, the father of the young man who run away with her, and purchased his claim to her, taking a bill of sale, also getting power of attorney, and all the requisite legal papers in the case.

"They came up to our city, and after a few days stay, fell upon the track of the girl, and brought the case before the U. S. Commissioner. Everything was perfectly plain—the girl admitted the main facts, and there was but one course to pursue. Commissioner Davis gave the slave over to the owners.

"The friends of the Chavres family, who are all respectable, ascertained the price of the girl—it was $1200—and they set about raising it. The family raised $400 by mortgaging their real estate, and the remaining $800 was given by the citizens of Alton, who came nobly forward to the work. The case was a very peculiar one, and excited very deep feeling, yet no outbreak nor disposition to do violence was manifested. Hard though it seemed, yet the people of Alton were determined to abide by the law."

DESTRUCTION OF A SHIP BY LIGHTNING.—The British ship Shand, Capt. Christie, from Calcutta, Dec. 5, arrived at Boston March 20. She brought the passengers and a part of the crew of the clipper ship Golden Light, which sailed from New York, Feb. 12, for San Francisco. On the night of the 22d February, in lat. 22 23 north, lon. 47 45 west, the Golden Light was struck by lightning, all hands were driven to the boats, numbering, passengers and crew, 35 persons. The ship was shortly after enveloped in flames, and burnt to the water's edge. The boats, five in number, were abundantly supplied with provisions and water; one of them was missing on the morning of the 24th, and another parted company on the fourth night after leaving the ship. After five days exposure, the remaining three boats were picked up by the ship Shand, as above. Fifteen only out of the 35 are known to have been saved. The Golden Light was owned by Mr. James Hutchins, of New York. The value of the ship and her cargo is about $300,000, which is fully insured. It was her first trip, and she had been out but twelve days. She registered 1,140 tuns. It is supposed that 15 persons have perished by the perils of the sea.

DEATH OF JOHN ASPDEN.—A Philadelphia letter, dated March 17, says: John Aspden, whose sudden death in this city on Monday I noticed, was buried this afternoon from Swanson-st., Southwark. Mr. Aspden was one of the English claimants of the immense estate left by Matthias Aspden. Before the case was decided by the Supreme Court in favor of the American heirs, the latter proposed to the deceased to compromise the matter, and offered to pay him the sum of $250,000, to relinquish his claim; this he refused to do, and the decision of the Court cut him off without a farthing. On Monday morning the estate was divided between the heirs at law, and almost in the same moment John Aspden fell dead, at a tavern in Carter's Alley, of disease of the heart, supposed to have been induced by disappointment and mortification. At the time of his death his pockets contained a solitary cent! his entire fortune! To-day, the man who might have been the possessor of a quarter of a million of dollars, was borne to his grave from an obscure part of the District of Southwark. Truth is quite as strange as fiction.

THE KAFFIR WAR.—The bark Corsair arrived at Providence, R. I., March 8th, bringing Cape Town papers to the 4th January. The Cape Town Mail contains accounts of a severe fight, in which 6,000 Basutos, armed horsemen, were routed by about 1,000 British. The Chief "Morhesh" had agreed to deliver 10,000 head of cattle and 1,000 horses as a fine for the depredations which he had committed on the colonists. He failed to comply with his engagements, and the Governor advanced into his territory to seize the cattle. The Basutos defended their property, and although the British at one time captured 30,000 head, they were compelled to abandon all but 6,000 head. The Basutos, however, were overthrown, and the next day the Chief sued for peace. The conflict lasted from morning till eight o'clock in the evening. The British loss was 38 killed and 15 wounded. The loss on the other side was much greater.

The extravagance of the people of New York exceeds any thing in their previous history. Houses costing $75,000, or $100,000, with furniture, mirrors, carpeting, pictures, frescoes, ect., to match, are not uncommon. There have been balls recently at which diamonds and emeralds worth $40,000 were worn. Thousand dollar dresses are common. Ladies have appeared at parties with cloaks embroidered with pearls.

A VALUABLE DEAD LETTER.—A valuable "dead letter" came to life recently at the letter office in Washington. Last September a gentleman of one of the Western States purchased a farm still further out in the "Eden of America." He was going in person to survey his new possession, but instead of carrying a sum of $2,500 about him, preferred consigning it to the mails. On arriving at the town which was the terminus of his journey, he inquired at the post-office for the letter which contained the treasure, but owing to the failure of the mail on that particular day, or some other cause, he did not receive it. The alleged loss was communicated to the Department at Washington, and prompt measures were adopted to ferret out the cause. On Monday, however, the letter, enclosing five $500 bills, in good money, was received as a "dead letter." The owner was immediately apprized of the discovery, and will soon be in possession of the funds.

SUFFERINGS OF AN EMIGRANT PARTY.—In a letter to the Galena Advertiser, written from Oregon, the sufferings of an emigrant party are briefly given, which makes up a sad picture of Western adventure. J. C. Morrison, of Tazewell county, arrived safely in Oregon. Their teams gave out five hundred miles this side of their destination. They left their oxen and those who had families, and started down Lewis River on the beds of their wagons; and out of twenty young men so embarked, only four ever got ashore alive, so rapid was the stream, and so full of rocks. The four having escaped, started through an uninhabited country, with but little provision, and a few clothes. They arrived at the settlement at last, after having passed through trials and dangers beyond the power of pen or tongue to describe.

JERRY RESCUERS RESCUED.—Enoch Reed, (colored,) tried for resistanne of process, under the act of 1790. Convicted. Not sentenced.

William H. Salmon, tried for resistance of the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850. Acquitted.

Ira H. Cobb, ditto. Jury disagreed.

John B. Brigham, ditto. Ditto.

Such is a brief summary of the action taken by the United States Court, during three weeks, at the City Hall, Albany. Some dozen or so persons stood accused at the beginning of the term. Three white men have been acquitted or left unpunished, for the rescue of Jerry, and one black man has been convicted of something else. And the Court stands adjourned.

SUMMARY.

We learn from the Randolph (Catt.) Whig, that Michael Bond, of Randolph, died very suddenly on the 28th ult., from the effect of chewing aconite, or what is commonly called wolf's bane, supposing it to be a root of altogether a different nature. The occurrence took place at the drug store of C. L. Fitch, in Randolph, where the root, it seems, was exposed on the counter. Mr. Bond, and two or three others, were induced to taste it, none knowing or thinking it to be poisonous. Mr. Bond was immediately taken sick, and after some delay went home. A physician was called in—too late, however, to render any assistance, and he expired in about two hours after eating the root.

The Norwich Courier states that Judge Wait, of the Superior Court, has issued an injunction against the Eastern Bank at West Killingly, Ct., thus closing its doors for the present. The circulation of this Bank is $110,000, in addition to which it has other liabilities which will raise the whole amount of its debts to $133,600. Its assets, according to the paper above quoted, are $40,000 in bonds of stock of the Rock Island (Ill.) Railroad $10,000 in specie, and $15,000 receivable, on notes discounted to customers—making in all $65,000.

Samuel R. Potter, Esq., of Willmington, N. C., has lost in the course of a few weeks ten valuable young slaves at Point Peter, by a disease resembling pneumonia. They were taken sick in succession, and died after a brief illness. The negroes were hearty and healthy up to the contracting of the disease which hurried them off. Near Weldon, Mrs. A. Powell, her son-in-law, Mr. Walker, and a Mr. Walker, residing in the same house, all died within two days of each other, and of the same disease.

Last year there were running within the city of New York twenty-five different omnibus lines, employing 561 omnibuses, and paying, in the aggregate, $10,500 for licenses. Most of them pay $20 per annum. The drivers receive, on the average, $1 25 daily. Each omnibus makes eight trips per day. There are attached to every stage, eight horses, with two extras, to provide against accidents. The receipts of each stage are on an average $8 per day. The cost of an omnibus is about $500.

The hail-storm at Columbus, Ga., commenced at a quarter past 2 o'clock on Thursday afternoon, and in ten minutes' time did immense damage, almost every house in the city being injured. The warehouses of Mr. Rankin and Messrs. Gunby, Daniel & Co., were all partially blown down and unroofed. Six or eight storehouses about Rankin's Corner had their front walls entirely prostrated. Many private residences were partially unroofed, almost every chimney blown down, and the streets were lumbered with the trunks of fallen shade-trees.

A Philadelphia letter of March 14 says:—John Aspden died suddenly at a hotel in Dock-st., this city, this morning. Cause—disease of the heart. Mr. Aspden was interested in the celebrated Will case which recently excited so much attention. The deceased was one of the heirs whose claim was not recognized. One curious circumstance in relation to the death of the deceased is the fact that the immense estate ($850,000) was divided this morning.

Capt. Ericsson has made a contract with the Navy Department to construct for the Government a model Caloric Engine of sixty-horse power—such an engine as Capt. E. proposes to apply to a screw frigate. This engine is to be made forthwith, and sent to be put up in the Navy Yard before the next meeting of Congress.

The telegraph from New Orleans reports the destruction of a portion of the building of Vanderbilt's Nicaragua Transit Co., at San Juan, on the 6th inst. The difficulty had led to great excitement and the refusal to take Mr. Squier up the river and any of the citizens passengers to New York.

Santa Aña is called to the supreme power in Mexico for the sixth time. The ablest man of his country, he is her evil genius; always distrusted, and resorted to by the people only when all is desperate, and anarchy and dissolution stare them in the face. His temporary popularity has not failed to be followed by universal execration; on each former occasion he has only made worse a state of things already intolerable; and now his return wears a gloomy and sinister aspect.

State Engineer McAlpine, in his report to the Legislature, in 1852, says: "An important fact is also established, which, up to this time, had been doubted by most men conversant with railroad transports, which is, that passengers can be transported at an expense of less than one cent per mile. This result is obtained as a rule, when the average loads are 90 passengers each mile run."

Among the Editors chosen to the Massachusetts Constitutional Convention, are Wm. Schouler, of the Atlas, J. S. Sleeper, of the Journal, R. Dawes, of the North Adams Transcript, and J. B. Morse, of the Newburyport Herald. Let any other profession make a better show.

For the collection of the Revenue at the port of Boston and Charlestown, 168 persons are employed, with the following salaries: Collector, $6,400; Naval Officer, $5,000; Surveyor, $4,900; two Deputy Collectors, $2,500 each; one do., $1,500; 26 Collector's Clerks, at salaries from $1,800 down to $1,000; 56 Inspectors, at $1,095.

The Weston Reporter says, that on the 10th of December last, a young Indian by the name of John Coon, aged fifteen years, killed, with an iron poker, a boy named Curtis Punch, aged fifteen years. On the 18th ult., the boy Coon was shot by six men, after sentence of death being passed upon him by a council of the nation. He died like a brave—not a tear started from his eye.

The fare from Albany to Buffalo is to be reduced to six dollars, by railroad. From Buffalo to Sandusky, new and splendid steamboats are to convey passengers for $1; and the Mad River Railroad will carry from Sandusky to Cincinnati for $4; making $11 from Albany to Cincinnati.

A dispatch dated Cincinnati, March 16, 1853, says: The boilers of the steamer Bee exploded to-day on the Ohio river, at West Franklin, below Evansville, killing Mr. Smith, (one of the pilots) and Mr. Bryan, the steward. Mr. Stark, the first clerk, Mr. Reeder, the other pilot, and four of the deck hands, were dangerously scalded.

The inventors of gun-cotton, Prof. Schonboin, of Basle, and Prof. Bottger, of Frankfort, have made over their process of preparation to the Austrian Government for 30,000 florins, two-thirds of which fall to the share of the former, as having the priority of invention. The money has already been paid in Frankfort.

In Shiloh, N. J., 3 mo. 18, by Eld. Wm. M. Jones, Mr. WILLIAM HUMEL to Miss RUTH DAVIS, daughter of Mr. Jeremiah B. Davis.

DIED,

At his residence, near New Salem, Va., on the 8th of March, 1853, about 8 o'clock in the evening, after sixteen days illness, JONATHAN F. RANDOLPH, in the 78th year of his age. The deceased was a native of the State of New Jersey, from whence he emigrated with his father and family in early life to western Virginia, and was among the first settlers of the town of New Salem, at which place he served for a term of time in a company of Indian spies, guarding the lives and property of the inhabitants of that section of country from the depredations of that savage foe. Soon after the Indians were expelled from the country, he built of the forest trees that dwelling in which he died, after being its constant occupant for more than fifty-three years. He has left an infirm, blind, and otherways long-afflicted widow to mourn the loss of a kind, attentive husband; and by his death eight children, all of whom have families, with numerous other connections, have lost an affectionate father and relative; and the community in which he lived is deprived of a long-tried friend—a prominent, useful citizen.

He became a subject of renewing grace many years ago, and united with the New Salem Seventh-day Baptist Church, of which body he remained a faithful member up to the time of his death. His disease was erysipelas. As it made its fatal progress, racking his body with pains, swelling, and scorching distress, prostrating all its powers, his mind was composed, calm, and prayerful, anticipating the hour of his dissolution as a welcome period, near at hand. His evidences of full forgiveness seemed at times not to be as clear as desirable, yet his hope was strong, faith unwavering, trusting in the merits of Christ. As death approached, he became more and more anxious to depart. Some of his last words to his friends were, "My time is short, yet to me it seems long; I want to be delivered from this body of sin and death—go to the arms of Jesus to rest, weep not for me."

In Canton, Ill., on Wednesday, March 2d, ASA LEE DAVISON, M. D., aged 59 years and 3 months. Dr. Davison was born in Rensselaer county, New York, in 1793. Before removing to Illinois, he resided a number of years in Allegany county, New York, where he filled several important offices. He afterwards resided in Ashland county, Ohio. He removed to Tazewell county, Illinois, in 1833, and to Canton in 1840. He has been connected with The Canton Register as one of the proprietors and senior editor for about two years. He enjoyed a well-earned reputation as a skillful physician and a faithful and able editor.

In Scott, N. Y., on the 7th of February, 1853, of putrid typhus fever, LOUISA, daughter of Jonas Frink, aged 19 years.

In Scott, on the 16th of February, 1853, of the same disease, BARTON C. PALMER, aged 18 years, the son of a widow, from whom she expected much help in her declining years. This death is much felt by his associates.

In Scott, March 7th, 1853, of the same disease, MARY ANN BARBER, aged 32 years, widow of the late Henry Barber. She was a worthy member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Scott, and has left a boy eight years old, an only child, just recovering from the same disease, without father or mother to care for him, but not without friends.

In Bristol, R. I., March 2d, very suddenly, Mr. AMOS CRANDALL, aged 41 years.

In Hopkinton, R. I., March 14th, Mr. JESSE WILBOUR, aged 94 years.

In Hopkinton, R. I., March 16th, Mr. GEORGE W. HOLDRIDGE, aged 54 years, for some years a member of the State Legislature.

In Bacon's Neck, N. J., 3 mo. 11, WALTER, son of Mr. George Bonham, aged between two and three years.

In Plainfield, N. J., March 9th, JAMES H. COCHRAN, son of Isaac S. and Cornelia M. Dunn.

Missionary Society—Board Meeting.

THE next Quarterly Meeting of the Executive Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society will be held at the house of David Dunn, New Market, N. J., on Fifth-day, March 31st, at 10½ o'clock A. M. GEO. B. UTTER, Rec. Sec.

A Quarterly Meeting of the Board of Managers of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society will be held at the same place at 2 o'clock P. M.

Notice—Eastern Association.

THE churches composing the Seventh-day Baptist Eastern Association are requested to take a contribution to aid the missionary operations within the limits of the Association, and remit the same to the Treasurer, Asher M. Babcock, of Westerly, R. I., previous to the 1st of April, as the money is needed.

By order of the Executive Committee,

S. S. GRISWOLD, Secretary.

Western Association—Executive Board.

THE Executive Board of the Western Association will hold its next quarterly session at Nile, on Fourth-day evening, April 6. J. BAILEY, Sec.

Ministerial Conference.

AT a meeting of several of the ministers of the Eastern Association, for the purpose of considering what is advisable for the ministers to do in addition to their regular pastoral labors for the advancement of religion in their several churches, it was thought advisable to form a Ministerial Conference, the object of which should be the promotion of Christianity among the churches, and the mutual improvement of the ministers. And to carry the same into effect, it was concluded to hold a meeting with each church located in the eastern part of the Association, at least once a year. The first meeting of said Conference is to be held with the church at Greenmanville, Ct., commencing April 10th, at 2 o'clock P. M., to continue as long as circumstances shall require.

It will be remembered, that the primary object of this arrangement is the advancement of religion; therefore members of sister churches are requested and expected to attend as convenience may permit.

It is to be hoped, that our churches will coöperate with us in this effort, by their prayers and labors; and may the Head of the Church favor us with his presence and blessing. S. S. GRISWOLD, Sec. of Con.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses, Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

"THE AMERICAN SLAVE CODE, IN THEORY AND PRACTICE: Its distinctive features shown by its Statutes, Judicial Decisions, and Illustrative Facts." By WILLIAM GOODELL, author of the "Democracy of Christianity," "Slavery and Anti-Slavery," &c. New York: American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 48 Beekman street. The work contains 430 pages 12 mo, neatly bound in cloth, and will be sold for cash at 75 cents single copy, $6 per dozen, and $45 per hundred. Also, in paper covers, at a deduction of 10 cents per copy from the above prices.

Orders may be forwarded to LEWIS TAPPAN, 48 Beekman street, New York.

Extract of a Letter from Hon. Wm. Jay to the Author.

"Your analysis of the slave laws is very able, and your exhibition of their practical application by the Southern Courts, evinces great and careful research." "Your book is as impregnable against the charge of exaggeration as Euclid's Geometry, since, like that, it consists of propositions and demonstrations. The book is not only true, but it is unquestionably true."

Eva.

Dry the tears for holy Eva,
With the blessed angels leave her;
Of the form so soft and fair
Give to earth the tender care.

For the golden locks of Eva
Let the sunny south-land give her
Flowery pillow of repose—
Orange bloom and budding rose.

In the better home of Eva
Let the shining ones receive her,
With the welcome voiced psalm,
Harp of gold and waving palm!

All is light and peace with Eva;
There the darkness cometh never;
Tears are wiped, and fetters fall,
And the Lord is all in all.

Weep no more for happy Eva,
Wrong and sin no more shall grieve her;
Care and pain and weariness
Lost in love so measureless.

Gentle Eva, loving Eva,
Child confessor, true believer,
Listener at the Master's knee,
"Suffer such to come to me."

O, for faith like thine, sweet Eva,
Lighting all the solemn river,
And the blessings of the poor
Wafting to the heavenly shore! [Whittier.

Juan Fernandez.

A narrative of adventures in this far-famed Island, by I. Ross Browne, is given in a recent number of Harper's Magazine. Its author visited the Island in 1849, and examined the Cave and Castle of Alexander Selkirk. There were sixteen persons residing on the Island at that time, one American, and four or five Chilian men, with their wives and children. Their habitations, and the productions of the Island, are thus described:—

"There are in all some six or seven huts, pleasantly surrounded by shrubbery, and well supplied with water from a spring. These habitations are built of the straw of wild oats, interwoven through wattles or long sticks, and thatched with the same; and, whether from design or accident, are extremely picturesque. The roofs project so as to form an agreeable shade all round; the doorways are covered in by a sort of projecting porch, in the style of the French cottages along the valley of the Seine; small out-houses, erected upon posts, are scattered about each inclosure; and an air of repose and freedom from worldly care pervades the whole place, though the construction of the houses and mode of living are evidently of the most primitive kind. Seen through the green shrubberies that abound in every direction, the bright yellow of the cottages, and the smoke curling up in the still air, have a very cheerful effect; and the prattling voices of the children, mingled with the lively bleating of the kids, and the various pleasant sounds of domestic life, might well lead one to think, that the seclusion of these islanders from the busy world is not without its charms. Small patches of ground, fenced with rude stone walls and brush-wood, are attached to each of these primitive abodes; and rustic gateways, overrun with wild and luxuriant vines, open in front. Very little attention, however, appears to be bestowed upon the cultivation of the soil; but it looks rich and productive; and might be made to yield abundant crops by a trifling expenditure of labor. The Chilians have never been distinguished for industry; nor is there any evidence here that they depart from their usual philosophy in taking the world easy. Even the American seemed to have caught the prevailing lethargy, and to be content with as little as possible. Vegetables of various kinds grow abundantly wherever the seeds are thrown, among which I noticed excellent radishes, turnips, beets, cabbages, and onions. Potatoes of a very good quality, though not large, are grown in small quantities; and, regarding the natural productiveness of the earth, there seemed to be no reason why they should not be cultivated in sufficient quantities to supply the demands of vessels touching for supplies, and thereby make a profitable source of revenue to the settlers. The grass and wild-oats grow in wonderful luxuriance in all the open spaces, and require little attention; and such is the genial character of the climate, that the cattle, of which there seems to be no lack, find ample food to keep them in good condition, both in winter and summer. Fig-trees, bearing excellent figs, and vines of various sorts, flourish luxuriantly on the hill-sides. Of fruits, there is quite an abundance in the early part of autumn. The peaches were just out of season when we arrived; but we obtained a few which had been peeled and dried in the sun, and we found them large and of excellent flavor. Many of the valleys abound in natural orchards, which have sprung from the seeds planted there by the early voyagers, especially by Lord Anson, who appeared to have taken more interest in the cultivation and settlement of the Island than any previous navigator."

Gen. Jackson's Reminiscences of the Battle of N. O.

'Philo Jackson' writes to the Savannah Journal an interesting account of a visit to Gen. Jackson at the Hermitage in 1839, from which we extract the following:—

"I longed to hear him speak of his great battle, and one of the geatest battles too of modern history, the crowning exploit of his military life, the battle of the 8th of January, before New Orleans. He had just returned from his last visit to that city, and lamented the decease of most of his old companions since that battle. All the officers except Col. Tiebault, he observed, were dead. He then graphically described the field, the fortifications, as he laughingly called them, and the victory, in a manner I shall never forget. Mr. Eaton (said Gen. Jackson) has greatly erred in his description of the American works. He says I had a 'strong breastwork of cotton bags.' There was not a bag of cotton on the field, Sir! I had some store boxes and sand-bags, or bags filled with sand, and these were extended along the lines; but they were so low, that at the close of the action, when the British surviving General, in command, came riding up on an elegant horse, to surrender his sword, when he got near me, I heard him exclaim, with mortified surprise, 'Barricades! I could leap them with my horse!' I laughed heartily at his astonishment, for so he could, and besides, on one wing the works were not completed; I had nothing there but a cornfield fence, if the British had only known, to turn it! But by keeping my men constantly throwing over facines and ladders on the works, the British were effectually deceived. But (continued Gen. J.) I never had so grand and awful an idea of the Resurrection as on that day. After the smoke of the battle had cleared off somewhat, (our men were in hot pursuit of the flying enemy,) then I saw, in the distance, more than five hundred Britons emerging from heaps of their dead comrades, all over the plain!—rising up, and more distinctly visible as the field became clearer, coming forward and surrendering as prisoners of war to our soldiers. They had fallen at our first fire on them, without having received a scratch, and lay prostrate, as if dead, till the close of the action."

Short Sight.

Those who are engaged in occupations which require the long-continued employment of the eyes on minute objects, are more apt to become near-sighted than those who are not thus employed. Mr. Lawrence attended a book sale, and found that out of twenty-three persons who were present, twelve of the number wore glasses. Like several other affections of the eye, myopia is sometimes hereditary, the children of short-sighted parents being more apt than others to be affected with the disease. All minute occupations, such as sewing, long continued reading, drawing, &c., should be abandoned; the head should be kept erect; the coverings of the neck should be loose, and straining of every kind should be avoided, to prevent increase of congestion. Mild, unirritating diet, pure air, active exercise, and the practice of looking at distant objects in the open country, will be very beneficial.

The far-discerning eye of the Indian is well known, and it is asserted that near sightedness does not exist among the Arabs, or Tartars, who are used to roam about, and to look at distant objects. The power, also, which sailors possess of seeing at a great distance, is only acquired by practice. An experienced "look-out man" can very soon descry the character and nation of a distant sail, which, to any ordinary observer, might seem a mere speck on the ocean. Some of the exercises of a soldier increase the power of recognizing distant objects. "It was not unusual," says Reveille Parise, "to observe that among the troops the sight of many near-sighted conscripts was restored." In the case of a boy born without arms, who possessed the power of writing, &c., with his toes, the power of distinct vision was so much lengthened that the boy could not see at the usual focal distance as well as at his feet. By the early application of concave glasses, the crystaline is kept in a wrong position, and efforts of nature to overcome the defect are prevented. Give a person with excellent sight a glass slightly concave, and he will at first see less distinctly than with the naked eye. He will, however, soon become so accustomed to its use, that it will not incommode, but even become indispensable to him. Gradually increase the concavity, and you shall see that the organ will change in a similar manner, so that an individual with good sight will, at the end of a few years, become affected with complete myopia, and will ultimately require glasses of the shortest focus. Curious Document from Jerusalem.

The bark Marietta, Captain Capurcus, arrived at New York a short time ago from Jerusalem, having stopped at Malta on her way, where she took cargo. Her register is one of the most curious documents we have ever seen. It is signed by the Patriarch of Jerusalem, and stamped with his seal. This seal is a very curious and ancient piece of workmanship; it is composed of five crosses—a large one with four small ones surrounding it. The seal is supposed to be about one thousand years old. At the head of the register, which is a piece of parchment, is the coat of arms of Jerusalem, with five crosses—the same as on the seal, and the words "Mount Sion in Jerusalem," encircling them. At the bottom of the large cross are two naked arms, with a small cross in the center. The paper is endorsed by the Turkish Consul at Malta, dated Feb. 29th, 1852, and underneath is the coat of arms of the Ottoman Empire, with a crescent in the center. Below is a copy of the register, translated from the original Latin.

Translation.

F. Bernardinus De Montefranco, Father over the Seraphic Province, Provincial Minister, Guardian of Holy Mount Sion and of the Holy Sepulchre of Jesus Christ, Visiter General and Guardian of all the Holy Land, and Vicar General and Humble Servant in the Lord of the Most Illustrious Remus, Patriarch of Jerusalem—

To our very much beloved in Christ, Blasius Moysius Peter Capurcus, Captain of the Jerusalemite bark called Marietta, whose proprietor is James Montanus:—

The condition of our profession so far forbids us to bestow worldly favors upon any one, that we cannot render temporal proofs of the gratitude we owe. But the benignity of the Holy See, moved by bowels of maternal compassion, to open the inexhaustible treasures of its own bounty, has mercifully granted that the superiors of the Holy Land respectively may, and have power to requite temporal benefits with spiritual recompense, in the case of those persons who have eminently deserved it, and are living in the faith of the Holy Roman Catholic Church. We, therefore, by Divine mercy, and by the grace of the Holy See, although discharging, with merits unequal to it, the duties of this prelacy, by which we respectively guide the reins of the East at this present time, in consequence of previous manifold testimony of your Catholic faith, the virtue of your morals, and your benevolent love to the associated children of the stigmatized Francis the Seraphic; also for your gratuitous transportation of the same to various regions of the world, (since in our presence you make known to us your desire of hoisting on your bark aforesaid the glorious standard of the Holy Land,) being kindly disposed towards you, and desirous to accede to your wishes, by the tenor of these presents, by the authority which we exercise, we grant you permission to unfurl the aforesaid standard, consisting of five red crosses on a white ground, viz: the royal standard of this Holy Land, which is bedewed with the most precious blood of Jesus Christ, and to raise it on the peak of your gallant bark, for which may the sea be calm, may the winds be propitious, and may a harbor be present. But we enjoin all and singular, of whatever degree and condition, whether of imperial or of kingly majesty, or whatever other heighth of exalted station, excellency, and nobility, surpassing in splendor according to the gradations of power, that these presents may have equal effect everywhere throughout the world. Moreover, we exhort by the bowels of the mercy of our God, all commanders of ships, of whatever kind they may be, and the governors of all forts, ports and States, that they suffer no damage to be sustained by you, or your crew, or your effects, or permit you to be assailed; but that they deem you possessed, as you are, of the ever living word of the Cross, worthy of being honored, defended, and venerated. And in order to your more certain success, we have decreed that this letter be confirmed under our own hand, and bear our great seal.

Farewell in the Lord, and continually give your filial service to the Holy Church, and show your kindness to our brethren.

Dated at the Holy City of Jerusalem, from the Convent of the Most Holy Saviour, on the 28th day of July, 1849.

Seal of the Five Crosses, consisting of one large and four small, one in each angle of the large Cross.	(Signed,) F. Bernardinus a Montefranco, Guardian of the Holy Land.

By order of Remus, Father in Christ,
(Signed,) F. Joannes A. Pouzo.
Secretary of the Holy Land.

The Gin Palaces of London.

The London gin palace is generally at the corner of two intersecting streets, in a gin-drinking neighborhood. The doors are large, swinging easily upon patent hinges, and ever half-and-half—half open, half shut, so that the most undecided touch of the dram-drinker admits him. The windows are of plate glass, set in brass sashes, and are filled with flaming announcements, in large letters, "The Cheapest House in London," "Cream of the Valley," "Creaming Stout," "Brilliant Ales," "Old Tom, fourpence a quartern," "Hodges' Best for mixing," and a variety of other entertainments for the men and beasts who make the gin palace their home. At night splendid lights irradiate the surrounding gloom, and an illuminated clock serves to remind the toper of the time he throws away in throwing away his reason.

Within, the splendor is in keeping with the splendor without; counters fitted with zinc, and a long array of brass taps; fittings of the finest Spanish mahogany, beautifully polished; bottles contaning cordials, and other drugs, gilded and labeled, as in the apothecaries' shops. At one side is the bar parlor, an apartment fitted up with congenial taste, and usually occupied by the publican; in the distance are vistas, and sometimes galleries, formed altogether of huge vats of the various sorts of liquor dispensed in the establishment. Behind the counter, which is usually raised to a level with the breasts of the topers, stand men in their shirt sleeves, well dressed females, or both, dispensers of the "short" and "heavy;" the under sized tipplers, raising themselves on tiptoe, deposit the three half-pence for the "drop" of gin, or whatever else they require, and received their quantum of the poison in return; ragged women, with starveling children, match and ballad venders, fill up the foreground of the picture. There are no seats, nor any accommodation for the customers, in the regular gin palace; every exertion is used to make the place as uncomfortable to the consumers as possible, so that they shall only step in to drink and pay; step out, and return to drink and pay again. No food of any kind is provided at the gin palace, save a few biscuits, which are exhibited in a wire cage, for protection against the furtive hand; drink, eternal, poisonous drink, is the sole provision of this whited sepulchre.

There is not in all London a more melancholy and spirit-depressing sight than the area of the larger gin palaces on a wet night. There the homeless, houseless miserables, of both sexes, whether they have money or not, resort in numbers for a temporary shelter; aged women selling ballads and matches, cripples, little beggar boys and girls, slavering idiots, pie-men, sandwich-men, apple-and-orange-women, shell-fish-mongers, huddled pell-mell, in draggle-tailed confusion. Never can human nature, one would imagine, take a more abject posture than is exhibited here; there is a character, an individuality, a family likeness, common to the whole race of sots; the pale, clayey, flaccid, clammy face, pinched in every feature; the weeping, ferret-like, lack-lustre eye, the unkempt hair, the slattern shawl, the untidy dress, the slip-shod gait, too well betray the confirmed drunkard. The noises, too, of the assembled topers are hideous; appalling, even when heard in an atmosphere of gin. Imprecations, execrations, objurgations, supplications, till at length the patience of the grog-seller, and the last copper of his customers, are exhausted, when, rushing from behind his counter, assisted by his shopmen, he expels, by force and arms, the dilatory mob, dragging out by the heels or collars the dead drunkards, to nestle, as best they may, outside the inhospitable door. Here, unobserved, may you contemplate the infinite varieties of men self-metamorphosed into beasts; soaker, tippler, toper, muddler, dram-drinker, beer-swiller, cordial-tipper, sot. Here you may behold the bare-foot child, hungry, naked, clay-faced, handing up on tiptoe that infernal bottle, which made it and keeps it what it is, and with which, when filled, it creeps home to its brutal father, or infamous mother, the messenger of its own misery. Here the steady, respectable sot, the good customer, slides in, and flings down his throat the frequent dram; then, with an emphatic "hah" of gratification, drops his money, nods to his friend, the landlord, and for a short interval disappears. Let us forget this painful scene; for it makes the head faint, and the whole heart sick.

Silk-worm Dyers.

It has long been known to physiologists, that certain coloring matters, if administered to animals along with their food, possessed the property of entering into the system and tinging the bones. In this way the bones of swine have been tinged purple by madder, and instances are on record of other animals being similarly affected. No attempt, however, was made to turn this beautiful discovery to account until lately, when Mons. Roulin speculated on what might be the consequence of administering colored articles of food to silk-worms just before they begin spinning their cocoons. His first experiments were conducted with indigo, which he mixed in certain portions with the mulberry leaves, serving the worms for food. The result of this treatment was successful; he obtained blue cocoons. Prosecuting still further his experiments, he sought a red coloring matter capable of being eaten by silk-worms without injury resulting. He had some difficulty to find such a coloring matter at first, but eventually alighted on the bignonia chica. Small portions of this plant having been added to the mulberry leaves, the silk-worms consumed the mixture and produced red colored silk. In this manner the experimenter, who is still prosecuting his researches, hopes to obtain silk as secreted by the worm of many other colors.

Application of the Electric Light.

Public curiosity, which has been much stimulated by repeated and partially successful experiments with the electric light, is likely to be soon fully satisfied by seeing that singularly beautiful and powerful application of voltaic electricity brought into permanent and profitable operation. It will be recollected, that up to the present time two serious obstacles have always opposed themselves to the use of this light as a means of illumination; one being the difficulty of obtaining a steady and permanent light, the other the great cost of the materials employed in its generation. These two difficulties have been at length grappled with by a young but already distinguished man of science (Dr. Watson,) who by a series of patient and highly philosophic experiments, has attained certain results, which, he has sanguine hopes, will ultimately lead to the successful commercial application of the light to various purposes. The uncertainty and flickering of the light being caused by the gradual wearing away of the points of the electrodes, and the consequent widening of the space through which the fluid must pass, Dr. Watson has attempted to obviate the difficulty, first by the employment of a new and patented material in the electrodes, which makes them less liable to wear in their incandescent state; and, secondly, by the action of a magnet placed in the base of the lamp, which, by its attractive powers, restores any deviation which may have taken place in the relative positions of the electricity under the influence of the light. By this invention the lamp is rendered self-regulating or automatic, and the first great difficulty, the inconstancy of the light, is to a considerable extent remedied.

The light having thus been got into working order, the next point to be considered was the great commercial question of cost, as until the invention could practically be made to pay, there was little hope of its being brought into general application. Without entering into any detailed technical explanation, it will be sufficient to state, that this end is attained by the substitution of cheaper metallic plates in the construction of the batteries, and the employment of such chemicals in the generation of the electric fluid, as shall, having first performed their illuminating duties, undergo such changes in their own forms as to become articles of considerable commercial value and ready sale. For the plates the inventor has substituted cast iron and platinized lead for the more expensive metals—silver, copper, and platina; and an idea of the saving here effected may be formed from the fact, that whereas a single plate of platina cost £3, one of platinized lead or cast iron can be made for 1*s*. For exciting agents, or electrolytes, as they are called, the patentee employs in one battery prussiate of potash, which, by the galvanic process is converted in those valuable articles of commerce, Prussian blue and ultramarine. In another battery, which is excited by nitrosulphuric acid, he gets, with the addition of bichromate of potash, the well-known color for carriage builders, chrome yellow, and by another chemical combination he gets red, the third primary color, having thus, it is almost needless to add, obtained the bases of almost all the pigments used in the useful or decorative arts.

The advantage which is expected from these discoveries is, that the commercial value of these products of voltaic action will completely cover the cost of manufacture, and leave the light itself a clear and unembarrassed source of profit. The value of all these improvements was tested by an exhibition of their results at the patentee's laboratory, at Wandsworth, to a circle of both scientific and commercial gentlemen. A large apartment was steadily and beautifully illuminated by the light for several hours, and much interest was excited by the mode in which, at regular intervals, the regulating operation of the magnets was brought to bear upon the electrodes. The illuminating process was pronounced to be completely satisfactory; producing, as it did, a perfect and brilliant daylight. In another apartment the chromatic products were exhibited, and were much commended for their brilliancy and truth of tints, so that both results, namely, the production of a steady and continuous light, and a costless exciting agent, may be said to be attained; provided that the debtor and creditor account which the patentees exhibit will ultimately bear the test of a rigorous commercial application.

"John Brown's Tract."

The Albany Evening Journal has an article, in connection with the "Racket River Improvement," in relation to the wilderness of Northern New York. It observes, that the most desolate, deserted wilderness west of the Rocky Mountains, has had its locality in Northern New York. "John Brown's Tract" has been the synonym of everything dreary in hills, forests, rocks and morass. Until very recently, no one has deemed it worth while to even propose measures for its improvement; and it has remained undisturbed in its primeval silence, except by the occasional tread of some hardy hunter, who has penetrated its wilds to capture the rare game and fish with which its lakes and woods abound.

Three years ago, however, moved by the desire to do something for the development of the commercial resources of the wilderness region lying on the borders of the Racket River and Lake, and lakes and rivers adjacent thereto, the Legislature appropriated $10,000 to improve the two former, with a view to render them available for lumbering purposes. A settlement has sprung up on the borders of Whitney Lake, in the town of Pomeroy; and 100 men have been for two years employed in getting out logs to float down the river upon which the bounty of the State has been expended. No less than 40,000 pine logs have been cut, and 25,000 have been put into the stream, at a point 65 miles from Potsdam, St. Lawrence County—a quantity sufficient to make 25 million feet of lumber.

This is most certainly a rich return for so small an outlay; particularly when it can be added that, as the result of this improvement, fifteen lots of land have been sold by the State to actual settlers, one saw-mill built, and preparations made for a formal organization of the town in the spring.

To render the improvement effectual, however, and to open additional territory upon the large streams which flow through the wilderness region, $10,000 more is asked.

Free Negroes in Illinois.

A most barbarous law was passed at the recent session of the Legislature of Illinois, by which free colored persons are forbidden to immigrate into that State, under the penalty of being sold into slavery. The law provides that every negro or mulatto, bond or free, who shall come into the State and remain ten days with the evident intention of residing therein, shall be deemed guilty of high misdemeanor, and be fined fifty dollars; and if the fine is not paid forthwith, he or she is to be sold at public auction to any person who will pay the fine and costs for the shortest time—and the purchaser shall have the right to compel the negro or mulatto to work for and serve out such time. And if the offender does not leave the State within ten days from the expiration of this servitude, he or she is liable to a second prosecution, the penalty being increased to one hundred dollars; and so on, with an addition of fifty dollars to the penalty for every offense—the same proceedings being had as to sale, as in the first case. This is a virtual introduction of slavery into the State of Illinois.

A Good Example.

It was recently stated, that James M. Whiton, Esq., had given $20 to the New Hampshire State Agricultural Society, but the purpose for which the donation was made were not stated. In the report of the Committee of Needlework, at the late fair at Meredith Bridge, the suggestion was made that "large quantities of embroidery and expensive work were offered for premiums, and but little needlework which was of practical utility." Acting upon this suggestion, Mr. Whiton sent the $20 to the officers of the society, with the request that it might be offered in premiums, for the best specimens of patching and darning. This is truly practical, and the New Hampshire girls will now have an opportunity of showing their skill in a description of needlework of far more importance and interest to the hard-fisted yeomanry of their native State, than fancy quilts, embroidered ottomans, tapestry, &c.

A TOUCH OF NATURE.—A car full of passengers recently passed over the Western Railroad, in which occurred a simple but touching scene, worthy of record. One of the passengers was a woman, carrying in her arms a child, who annoyed every one by its petulence and cries. Mile after mile the passengers bore the infliction of its noise, which rather increased than diminished, until at last it became furious, and the passengers nearly so. There were open complaints, and one man shouted, "Take that child out."

The train stopped at a station, when an old gentleman arose, and made the simple statement, that the father of the child had died, recently, away from home; that the mother had been on a visit to her friends, and had died while on the visit; that her dead body was on board the train; and that the child was in the arms of a woman who was a stranger to it. It was enough. There was a tear in nearly every eye, and all were melted into pity and patience. All selfishness was lost in thinking of the desolation of the poor little wanderer, who would have found a warm welcome in hands that, a moment before, would almost have visited it with a blow.

AGASSIZ AND HUMBOLDT.—Dr. Gibbs, of Charleston, at a dinner of the Medical Society, concluded a speech with this anecdote:—

"When Agassiz first came to this country, he was under the direction of Baron Humboldt, to whom he was largely indebted for aid in his pursuits, and though desirous of remaining here, he felt bound to return to Europe. Having received the offer of the Lawrence Professorship of Cambridge, he declined it on this account, but in writing to his patron, he mentioned this fact, and at the same time expressed a desire to remain longer in the United States. The reply of the noble old man was—'Sir, you belong to no country, you belong to science; wherever your labor can be most available in its pursuit, that is your country. You are released from all obligations to us. If you find the field of science furnishes you a better opportunity for your labors in the United States, you must remain there.'"

SMART.—The Milwaukie Wisconsin relates the following as an authentic transaction of the managers of the Rock River Valley Union Railroad:—

"It is said that the agent of the Company made a contract with an English house about a year since. He was to pay half cash, and the other half in bonds of the road. How to pay the half cash was the question, for the Company had no money. A lucky thought struck him—iron would probably advance. He ordered just double what the road would want—500 tons instead of 250; 1,000 tons instead of 500, and so on. Half the iron, before its arrival, was sold to the Southern Michigan Company for cash, at a trifle under the market price—by reason of the advance in iron, affording a profit to the agent. Thus the English house was paid one half cash, and the road got what iron it wanted, and had a little cash left to pay for grading a few miles."

SCOTCHMEN IN CANADA.—Col. Alex. Chisholm, when taking the census of Glengary, Canada, in 1852, made out a table of the number of persons of each clan in that county, of which we take the results from the Cornwall Freeholder: Of Macdonnells and Macdonalds 3,228; Macmilians 551; Macdougalls 541; McRaes 456; McLeods 437; Grants 415; Camerons 399; McGillises 359; Kennedys 333; McLennons 312; Campbells 304; Macintoshes 262; McGillivrays 243; McPhersons 242; Frasers 176; McPhees 157; McIntyres 140; Rosses 139; Chisholms 133; McGregors 114; Fergusons 110; McLaurins 102; McKenzies 99; Morrisons 99; McCormacks 83; McMartins 72; McKays 72; McArthurs 70; McLaughlins 68; Cattanachs 50. This is an inkling fo the immense Celtic emigration from Great Britain to the American Continent. Scotland is still pouring upon our shores her hardy sons.

A quantity of old Madeira wine, belonging to the estate of R. Buloid, deceased, was sold at auction in New York, recently, for $31¾ per gallon. This is equal to about fifty cents per wine glass.

The whole amount collected in New York for the benefit of the starving inhabitants of Madeira, was $14,000, a part of which was sent in cash, and a part in breadstuffs.

CHRIST THE BELIEVER'S LIFE—DEATH THE BELIEVER'S GAIN.

Abstract of a Funeral Sermon preached on the death of Eld. James H. Cochran, at the First Church of Alfred, Feb. 19th, by Eld. N. V. Hull.

Reported for the Sabbath Recorder by a Hearer.

"For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain."
Philippians 1: 21.

The church at Philippi was called into existence by the labors of Paul and Silas. While at Troas, a man of Macedonia stood by Paul, saying, "Come over into Macedonia and help us." He went and preached to the Philippians. Excitement and disturbance ensued, and Paul and Silas were cast into prison. The Jailor, Lydia, and others, were converted, and a church was organized. The history of this church shows it to have been one of the most important and flourishing of the early churches. There ever existed between its members and the apostle Paul deep and abiding affection and sympathy. In writing to them the epistle from which we have taken our text, he takes occasion to speak of their many good deeds to him, as well as the trials and afflictions to which he was subject. It certainly must have been deeply interesting to them to learn of his joys in tribulation, and his confidently looking forward to the joys of heaven, preferring rather to die than to live, save as living would be for the glory of Christ.

It is proposed to consider the doctrinal and practical points of the text, and then apply it to the case of the brother whose death we mourn.

I. Christ was the author of the life of the Apostle. The important idea connected with this is, that Christ is divine as well as human.

1. He was the author of his natural life. "All things were made by him, and without him was nothing made that was made." John 1: 3. Christ is here evidently spoken of. "Yet to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we in him." 1 Cor. 8: 6. Here the same divinity is manifested, as also in Col. 1: 16, and other passages, to which we might call your attention. All these point to the same great truth, that Christ is divine; hence the author of our natural life.

2. Christ was the author of the Apostle's spiritual life. This is a clear and prominent truth of revelation. "In him was life, and the life was the light of men." John 1: 4. "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." John 11: 25. "When Christ, our life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory." Col. 3: 4. These, with various other passages, prove that Christ is the life and the light of those who believe in his name.

II. Christ, or his glory, was the great object of the Apostle's life.

1. He labored for the glory of Christ. His very mission required this. He calls himself the apostle of Christ. He was bought with a price, and was the property and servant of his Lord. His sole object was to glorify God. Thus it is with all Christians. "For ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body and spirit, which are God's." 1 Cor. 6: 20. Christ having died for us, we ought not to live for ourselves, but for him. 2 Cor. 5: 15. We are not our own, but Christ's, and are bound to give the service of both body and soul to him. The Christian cannot separate between the works of body and mind—between his prayers and his labors—between his affections and his hands. We are to be religious in our heads, hands, and hearts, and we render acceptable service only when these are properly and harmoniously united.

2. The Apostle suffered for the glory of Christ. Phil. 3: 10. "That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death." He joined labor and suffering—suffering a great part of his ministry—being often in perils, imprisonments, and persecutions. As Christ suffered, so must his followers. These sufferings are to be borne willingly and cheerfully. "Rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad with exceeding joy." 1 Peter 4: 13.

III. Death gain to the Apostle.

Death was universally considered as the end of all delight. No one, unless enlightened by Christianity, could say that death was gain. All heathen philosophers and poets were wont to represent death as the end of all joy. Some, indeed, oppressed with evil, have sought death as a mitigation or release, but not as a positive gain. No other religion than the Christian makes death anything more than simply endurable—nothing positive. True, in their uncertainty, they sometimes picture death as connected with some indefinite reality—some elysian prospects are imagined; but nothing is certain, save as borrowed in some way from revelation. The Apostle sets death in a new and positive light—it is gain—absolute gain. What a light this was to the world! Mankind had been like a vessel tossed upon an unknown and dangerous sea, without any haven of hope and rest that could be entered. A deep and ardent longing of the human heart was satisfied when this truth was revealed. Its outgushing desires, like a hungry man presented with food, were supplied. Mankind were blindly groping after light, but found it not until Christianity came; then, all embracing it were supplied with light and life—were perfectly satisfied. It opened a fountain where we may drink and find new sweetness the longer we drink. No other religion ever did or could do this. No perfect satisfaction was ever found, save in the religion of Christ.

1. It is gain, because the Christian ceases from his labor. Every man has his labor to perform. The apostles had a peculiar and onerous labor. Paul entered upon this labor with his whole soul. He was brave and daring, vehement and persevering, whole-souled and devoted. Thus is every minister bound to labor. Ease, safety, and quietude, are not for him. Every Christian must, likewise, be zealous and laborious. He who waxes fat in the service of the Lord, is not fit for the service of Christ. Some think they have done about their whole duty, if they laud the labors and sacrifices of others. But it was not so with the early Christians. All that enter the Christian service, enter a service full of labor, privation, and sacrifice; but when death cometh, then they are released and taken home to the Lord, there to rest forever. "And I heard a voice saying unto me, Write, blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them." Rev. 14: 13.

2. Death is gain, because it releases the Christian from suffering. It is the Christian's lot, not only to labor, but also to endure sufferings incident to his profession and situation. But these all end at death. There will be to him no more weepings or dungeons, persecutions or lacerations of body—no more separations, flames, beheadings, or martyrdoms of any kind. "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away." Rev. 21: 4.

3. Death is gain, because the Christian will then be with Christ, and behold his glory. There has been a sentiment abroad in the world, that the soul has no more consciousness after death till the resurrection. But no just interpretation of Scripture will substantiate such a belief. Such a sentiment desecrates Christianity and approaches infidelity. We will refer to a few passages relating to this point. "Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me; for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world." John 17: 24; also, 14: 3, and 12: 26. These passages affirm that the disciples of Christ are to be with him. In 2 Cor. 5: 1—8, we have the spirit represented as inhabiting an earthly house, but if this were dissolved, it would have a building of God, a house not made with hands. In this earthly house we groan—the spirit groans, not the body—groans to exchange the earthly for the heavenly tabernacle. At death, mortality is swallowed up in immortality. The spirit is not represented as lying dormant, but as exchanging its mortal immediately for its immortal house. The Apostle was confident that while we are here in the body we are absent from the Lord; but he was no less confident, that to be absent from the body was to be present with the Lord; hence his willingness to depart, feeling assured that he should not have to pass through long ages in a dormant state, but would immediately be with Christ. So, also, we find him, in Phil. 1: 23, saying, "I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better." He was like a vessel, tossed between this world and the next. Why was he thus tossed?—why did he have those desires, those longings? Was it that he might leave this world to slumber on to the judgment? No, verily—a far brighter view animated him—a view of glory, near at hand—a heavenly state, upon which he was soon, very soon, to enter.

4. The Christian is not only to behold the glory of Christ, but is also to be a partaker of his glory. "The elders which are among you, I exhort, who also am an elder, and a witness of the suffering of Christ, and also a partaker of his glory, that shall be revealed." 1 Pet. 5: 1. Christians may sometimes mourn and repine at their lot; but when they look to heaven, who are not willing to suffer all that is in store for them? What can be too much to endure? What parent is not willing to watch and suffer through long nights of weariness for the sake of seeing the bloom of health again upon the cheek of his child? The patriot labors, fights and bleeds for his country, animated by the prospect of sharing her prosperity and receiving the benedictions of his countrymen. Thus it should be with Christians. They should willingly and cheerfully toil, and suffer, and die if need be, for their Master; for soon they shall sit in his presence—their souls bathed in an ocean of glory, and enjoy the unalloyed pleasures of heaven, and the companionship of Christ.

APPLICATION.

It remains to make an application of this subject to him whose death now afflicts us. It is a most difficult task for me. Hard it was for me to bring myself to the duty; for Bro. Cochran had been to me like an own brother, ever since our acquaintance. He was a frequent inmate of my family for several years. Neither during that whole time, nor since, did there ever exist between us any thing other than the most cordial feelings. His death comes home to me as the death of one of my kindred.

Bro. Cochran was born in Lanark, Scotland. His father was a wealthy magistrate. There is no evidence that he was a pious man; but he was noted for his remarkably open and generous nature. He devoted himself, during the last thirty years of his life, almost exclusively to reading. His mother was a devoted Christian. She labored and prayed for the spiritual interests of her children. Carefully did she instruct them in the things of religion. Under her care they learned many devotional hymns, the Psalms, and other portions of Scripture. Deep were the impressions made by those lessons—deep the channels of truth worn in their hearts. She died, and the boys, left to themselves, became infidel in their principles. Some, if not all of them, received a liberal education. Their father supplied them lavishly with money, never asking what was done with it, but whether more was wanted. The natural consequences followed.

After completing his education, Bro. Cochran came to this country, spending a while in the Canadas, and thence passed over into the States. During this time he was taken very sick, and lay for weeks in the extremest suffering and destitution, having none but strangers to supply his wants, as charity might impel them. After his recovery, he was one evening wandering through the streets of Albany, when he was attracted towards a Methodist chapel by the voice of the preacher. He had been taught to despise the Methodists above all other denominations. He entered the chapel reluctantly and slily, and took his position in an unobserved part of the house, feeling all the while as if he were performing some degrading act. The preacher was at that moment addressing young men, saying, that perhaps there were some young men now present, whose mothers had wept and prayed for them, had besought them to turn to Christ, and whose pure spirits were now looking down with deep solicitude upon their wandering, erring sons. He felt as if the preacher was addressing him directly. The case described was precisely his own. The words of the speaker sank deep into his soul, and made an impression that he could not remove. The prayers and tears of his sainted mother came up before him. They were with him wherever he went, or in whatever business he engaged. They haunted him by day and by night, until he was constrained to give his soul to Christ. He was baptized at Paterson, N. J., and united with the First-day Baptists.

After several changes, he came to Clarence, where I first became acquainted with him—he becoming a member of my family. He was, at first, very strongly opposed to the sentiments of our denomination. But he was sincere, and felt it his duty to investigate—to search for truth. The more he investigated, the more he became perplexed and dissatisfied with his own ground. His conflict was long and severe, fighting faithfully and earnestly every point. I discovered, however, that the truth was gradually gaining upon him. One Sixth-day afternoon I went to where he was at work in the field, and said to him, "Bro. Cochran, it is nearly sunset, and the Sabbath is at hand; what are you going to do?" With tearful eyes, he replied, "I have made up my mind never to work another Seventh-day." After embracing the Sabbath, it was a long time before he united with us as a people. During this time his struggles were severe. Other denominations saw that he was a man of talent and promise, and wisely used every means in their power to prevent his uniting with us, and to secure him to themselves. At length he united with us, and afterwards became a minister.

His life from that time is well known to you all. You can witness how he won upon our hearts. Those of you, especially, who are members of the Second Alfred Church, can testify to his ardent desires and unremitted labors for the prosperity of Zion. His frankness, love, and zeal, are all deeply stamped upon your hearts. He lived emphatically for Christ. He was one of the most conscientious men that I ever knew. Whatever he thought was right, he did. Whenever conscious of fault, he was ready and anxious to confess it, and equally ready to forgive faults in another. He labored for Christ with his whole soul.

As he drew near the end of his life, his lot was cast among a people that were prepared and willing to do for him every thing that human aid could do—a people that knew how to sympathize with him, and to mitigate his sufferings—that smoothed for him the pillow of death. Surrounded by such a people, and in the midst of a revival of religion, and spiritual prosperity, he breathed his last. His sun did not set behind a cloud, but in gorgeous light. For him to die was gain.

He is gone. Never more shall we enjoy his society on earth—never more behold those sparkling eyes or energetic movements—never more listen to his rapid, earnest utterance, with its rich Scotch brogue. But let us imitate his virtues. May we, like him, live for Christ, that, like him, we can feel that to die is gain. May his mantle fall on others. May many young men of our denomination be led to devote themselves to the work of the ministry; and may those who have already consecrated themselves to that work be imbued with a spirit that will not permit them to turn aside, or be diverted to other professions. But may they, like our deceased brother, willingly and cheerfully labor and suffer in the cause of Christ, that, like him, they can feel, when death shall come, that their labors and sufferings are over, and they prepared to enter upon the blissful state of an eternal rest—beholding and partaking of the glory of Christ.

THE WISDOM OF THE IGNORANT.

Some short time ago I spent a very pleasant evening in the study of a brother in the ministry. Some facts we had both been reading in the Watchman and Reflector, led us into a conversation on the striking remarks, of a religious kind, which are often made by the most ignorant persons, "who come to the knowledge of the truth."

He told me that a few years since he traveled in the South, and on one evening preached to a congregation where he was a perfect stranger. When he came out of the pulpit, among others who seemed greatly interested in the sermon, was an old man, a slave, who was not a little eulogistic relative to the new minister and his sermon; my friend checked him somewhat by saying that he should bless the great Master for the message, rather than the messenger, for that, after all, unassisted by the Holy Spirit, he was a poor creature. "Ah, massa," said the poor old slave; "ah, massa, never mind about being poor, so long as you have got such a rich Father." Noble sentiment! What doctor of divinity could have uttered a better?

Another fact he heard about this old man. His one subject was the love of Jesus Christ. One day some person said to him, "Well, you are always talking about Jesus Christ; which would you rather do, go to heaven and never see Christ, or go to hell to be with him forever?" The old man for a moment seemed astonished with the impiety of the inquirer, but thinking a little, he replied, "Ah, massa, there can be no hell where Jesus Christ is."

"I WOULD NOT LIVE ALWAYS."

Job 7: 16.

"I would not live always," on life's troubled ocean,
Remote from my home and my haven of rest,
To conflict forever with strife and commotion,
Borne on by the tempest, with watchings oppressed.
"I would not live always," for God has determined
The time for his wanderers to linger below,
And kindly relieves them from suffering and peril—
Affliction and sorrow the aged must know.
"I would not live always," though life is a treasure,
And childhood has dreams that are bright like the sun,
And youth full of hope has its visions of pleasure,
And manhood on missions of glory may run;
And age is the garner of life's recollections,
When the bright dreams of childhood may come up anew—
The visions of youth, and the glory of manhood,
May cheer the lone heart, as they pass in review.
Still, "I would not live always," for age has its sorrows,
None others can pity, none others can know;
No prospect relieves it with hope of the morrow,
For the foreboding shadows still darker must grow.
To-morrow the bark of the voyager may founder;
New dangers await him on each coming day;
He may break on the rocks or the quicksands asunder,
For no voyager returns from this perilous way.
Though the joys of past life may his memory retain,
And oft, when recalling, will light up his soul,
Yet how transient the pleasure, how mingled with pain,
From scenes of affliction, which sadden the whole.
For he thinks on the blessings his life has received,
As the source of his joys, of existence a part—
How the choicest of comforts his soul had conceived,
Made sharpest the arrows that pierced his heart.
His memory is faithful, and will true record keep,
On the heart's living tablets, of pangs it endures;
For the loved and the lost, he in secret will weep,
Though his tears may not tend his bereavements to cure.
"I would not live always," for life would debar me
Of treasures my broken heart longs to embrace;
It is Heaven alone can those treasures restore me,
And the impress of sorrow completely efface.
As an oak of the forest, I would not be left,
To contend with the tempests that howl o'er the waste—
Unclothed of its verdure, of branches bereft,
Despoiled of its strength, and its beauty defaced.
How could I alone drink the cup of my sorrows!
How stay, when my chosen companions have flown!
How live 'mong the tombs of my loved ones forever,
Like a sparrow to dwell on the house-top alone!
My Saviour, "I loathe it, I would not live always;"
O, take me to thee, in the land of the blessed;
With companions, and loved ones, that entered before me
In Heaven to lave in the ocean of rest. J. M.

THE CAPTIVE MILLERS.

A True Story.

BY S. WEEDEN.

It was on a delightful day in the early period of the American Revolution, while the British were in possession of Newport, R. I., that two men—one by the name of Hubbard, and the other by the name of Reed—started in a small boat for one of the adjacent islands. They had not proceeded far, however, before they were hailed by one of the British ships, and ordered to come on board immediately. When they reached the deck, the officer in command demanded of them whither they were going, and what was their occupation. They replied, that they were millers, and had started for one of the adjacent islands for the purpose of obtaining grain. The officer in command then ordered that they should be detained, notwithstanding they represented to him that, according to general custom, he ought not to capture and detain a miller. But to all their entreaties he remained inexorable. "You are only rebels," said he, "and deserve not your liberty." Finding it useless, therefore, to appeal to him, they tried to content themselves as well as they could, hoping they should be released in a short time. But day after day passed, and still they remained captives.

As soon as the news of their whereabouts reached their homes, Mrs. H., a most beautiful and amiable woman, and Mrs. Reed, went to visit their husbands, and, if possible, to obtain their release. They implored the commander, if he had any humanity, to grant their request, portraying in the most touching language how the British had already destroyed their property and made their once cheerful homes desolate and dreary. He listened to their touching appeals with apparent interest, but replied, "I cannot release them." They then left the ship, and returned to their cheerless homes, thinking, perhaps, that they had taken a last farewell of their beloved ones.

After this interview, the ship did not remain long in harbor before preparations were made for her departure to Halifax. During the passage thither, they suffered much from the want of food and water; for the small quantity of the latter which they were allowed, was so impure and filthy that they could hardly bear to taste it. Under such treatment, Reed soon became melancholy and dejected; but Hubbard was quite the reverse, for he had of late seemed to be a favorite with the commander, notwithstanding he was ever ready to vindicate the cause of the Colonies, whenever the subject was touched upon by any on board. One evening, however, while they were engaged in rather a warmer debate than usual, he let fall some remark which highly incensed the commander, who turned deadly pale, and started immediately for the cabin to obtain his sword. While he was gone, one of the men handed him a knife, and remarked, What you have to do, do quickly. He comprehended at a glance what he meant, and started immediately for the deck, closely followed by Reed. As quick as thought, they cut one of the boats loose, jumped into it, and started for the shore, which was but a short distance from them. But owing to the darkness of the night, they became bewildered, and when the morning at length dawned, they discovered that they had been sailing around the ship, instead of gaining the shore. They now became alarmed, and plied their oars with renewed energy, while they were consulting as to where they should go when they reached land. They soon decided to proceed directly to a house occupied by a miller, where the British were in the habit of sending daily for milk. It was not without some misgivings, however, that they made this decision, for fear of a betrayal. But knowing that something must be done, they determined to make the attempt. They soon gained the house, and asked for admission. The man inquired who was there, and they replied, Two brother millers; whereupon he arose quickly, and invited them in, calling at the same time to his wife to prepare them a bed, where they might gain a little repose. As soon as they had retired, the good lady went busily to work washing and mending their old clothes, showing them as much kindness as if they were Britons instead of rebels. They had not remained long in bed, however, before the miller came in with some of his apparel, and requested them to put it on, and repair to a wood near by, for the British were then coming to the house, and he feared they would make a search for them. Thereupon they arose and proceeded to the wood, though not exactly in the direction pointed out by the miller; for they still feared a betrayal. They lay concealed but a short time, however, before their kind host came to the wood and informed them that they could now return in safety, as the British had departed without even inquiring if they had seen them. We need scarcely add, that with hearts overflowing with joy and gratitude, on meeting such friends where they had nothing to expect but enemies, they accepted his kind offer to make his house their home, until they started for their own homes, which they reached in safety.

A PARAGRAPH ON HANDSOME WOMEN.

"As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman without descretion."—PROV. 11: 22.

This is one of Solomon's gems, albeit its setting may be deemed somewhat homely; but remember, ladies, some of the best nuts have very unsightly envelopes. Let us crack this one, and see if it has not a palatable, or at least a nutritious meat.

Liberally paraphrased, our proverb would run thus: Were some rich swine-owner senseless enough to ring his porkers' snouts with jewels, the ill-keeping, the inappropriateness of the thing would shock us, and beautiful as might be the jewels, we should not regard them as ornamental to swine; and the senseless wearers would soon thrust their jeweled snouts into the mire. So when a woman is "fair"—has a pretty face, a fascinating exterior, but is without discretion—without that delicate perception of what is fit, and that maidenly circumspection which will enable her at all times to demean herself becomingly; when it is apparent that within exists an intellectual waste, and that her face constitutes her sole capital; we instinctively feel that her beauty is in truth not beauty—that it is misplaced and valueless like the jewel of gold in a swine's snout. But were that jewel transferred to the forehead or neck of a comely woman, it might enhance her external loveliness. So if a handsome woman is likewise "discreet"—if a charming face is associated with a well-balanced mind, and attractive manners, it is a jewel so located as to be really ornamental and useful.

And now, fair reader, if you are blessed with personal beauty, be thankful—not elated; and improve this gift of God, as every other, to His glory in your own augmented usefulness. Remember that being a "fair woman," though it may prove a blessing, may and often does prove a fearful curse; while to be "without discretion," is a deficiency for which nothing can atone. Remember, moreover, that there is a moral beauty—not innate, but imparted by the Holy Spirit—which is worth infinitely more than personal comeliness; for it is only "the pure in heart,"—the spiritually beautiful, who shall "see God." "Beauty is vain; but a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised."

Has this article caught the eye of any young man, casting about him in search of "an helpmeet for him" in his pilgrimage through life? and is some pretty face laying siege even now to the citadel of thy heart? Before surrendering, make sure of one thing—that the jewel, which dazzles thine eye, be not found at last to bedizen only a swine's snout.

THE PLAIN OF BETHLEHEM.

Dr. Aiton, a Scottish traveler, of marked power as a writer, speaks thus of the Plain of Bethlehem, recently visited by him:—

The Plain is mainly under pasture, fertile and well watered, and there I saw shepherds still tending their flocks. These shepherds have great influence over their sheep. Many of them have no dogs. Their flocks are docile and domestic, and not like the black-faced breed in Scotland, scouring the hills like cavalry. The shepherd's word, spoken at any time, is sufficient to make them understand and obey him. He sleeps among them at night, and in the morning he leadeth them forth to drink by the still waters, and feedeth them by the green pasture. He walks before them slow and stately; and so accustomed are the sheep to be guided by him, that every few bites they take they look up with earnestness to see that he is there. When he rests during the heat of the day in a shady place, they lie around him, chewing the cud. He has generally two or three favorite lambs, which do not mix with the flock, but frisk and fondle at his heels. There is a tender intimacy between the Ishmaelite and his flock. They know his voice, and follow him, and he careth for the sheep. He gathereth his lambs, and seeketh out his flock among the sheep, and gently leadeth them that are with young, and carrieth the lambs in his bosom. In returning back to Jerusalem, I halted on a rugged height to survey more particularly, and enjoy the scene where Ruth went to glean the ears of corn in the field of her kinsman Boaz. Hither she came for the beginning of barley harvest, because she would not leave Naomi in her sorrow. "Entreat me not to leave thee; for whither thou goest I will go; and where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God. Where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried; the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me." How simple and tender! Here, when looking around me, honored I felt forever be her memory, not only for these touching sentiments, worthy of our race, even before the fall, and when the image of God was not yet effaced; but also in respect that she who uttered these words was the great-grandmother of David, and was of the generation of Jesus. Here, also, I looked back to the city of Bethlehem with lingering regret, uttering a common-place farewell to the scene, but never to its hallowed recollections.

THE BIBLE.

How comes it that this little volume, composed by humble men, in a rude age, when art and science were but in their childhood, has exerted more influence on the human mind and on the social system than all the other books put together? Whence comes it that this book has achieved such marvelous changes in the opinions of mankind—has banished idol worship—has abolished infanticide—has put down polygamy and divorce—exalted the condition of woman—raised the standard of public morality—created for families that blessed thing, a Christian home—and made its other triumphs by causing benevolent institutions, open and expansive, to spring up as with the wand of enchantment? What sort of a book is this, that even the winds and waves of human passion obey it? What other engine of social improvement has operated so long, and yet lost none of its virtue? Since it appeared, many boasted plans of amelioration have been tried and failed, many codes of jurisprudence have arisen, and run their course, and expired. Empire after empire has been launched upon the tide of time, and gone down, leaving no trace upon the waters. But this book is still going about doing good, leavening society with its holy principles—cheering the sorrowful with its consolations—strengthening the tempted—encouraging the penitent—calming the troubled spirit—and smoothing the pillow of death. Can such a book be the offspring of human genius? Does not the vastness of its effects demonstrate the excellency of the power to be of God?

JEWISH NEGROES.

Every year furnishes additional proof of the wide dispersion of the Jews, according to the declaration of the inspired prophets. Nearly fifteen hundred years before Christ, God, through his prophet Moses, threatened them with overthrow in case of apostacy, saying, "The Lord shall scatter thee among all people, from one end of the earth even unto the other." In fulfillment of this, we see them in all the cities of our own land, and the traveler meets them in every country of Europe, in Egypt, and in western and southern Asia. As unknown regions are visited, they are discovered in the most unexpected places; having, in some cases, as in India, even lost their original color, and become black. Lately a new discovery has been made, to which we would call the attention of our readers. The account is contained in a French paper, published at Paris, in pamphlet form, and entitled "Bulletin du Monde Chretin." We translate the following:—

"The Rev. Dr. Phillip, missionary in the North of Africa, gives the following details concerning that country. A Russian Jew, resident at Madeah, gave him information concerning a great number of Israelites inhabiting the oasis of the Sahara, and dwelling also at Bathnor, Bis-Wrabi, Tauggurt, Bousara, Bein-Uzab, Loquaz, etc. There are in each of these places as many as a hundred families, with numerous synagogues, and about a hundred copies of the Law written upon parchment, some of which were more ancient than any he had ever seen.

"But this is not all; other curious details reached Dr. Phillip from another source. A Jew who had accompanied a German traveler as far as Timbuctoo, found near the boundary of the kingdom of Bambara a large number of Jewish negroes. Nearly every family among them possesses the Law of Moses, written upon parchment. Although they speak of the Prophets, they have not their writings. Their prayers differ from those of other Jews, and are committed to little leaves of parchment stitched together and containing various passages derived from the Psalms. These Jews have mingled some of their superstitions of 'oral law,' (which they have not committed to writing) with those of their neighbors, the Mahommedans and the heathen. They enjoy equal liberty with other subjects of African chiefs, and have their synagogues and their rabbis. The explanation which they give of themselves, in connection with their black skin, is this: that after the destruction of Jerusalem, at the time of the first captivity, some of their ancestors, having neither goods nor lands, fled to the desert. The fatigue which they endured was so great that nearly all the females died by the way. The children of Ham received them with kindness, and by intermarriage with their daughters, who were black, communicated that color to their children. These children became, generation by generation, of a deeper hue, until no difference of color now distinguishes the children of Shem and those of Ham. The form of their features, however, is very different from that of the negroes around them."

These are highly interesting facts, and create a strong desire that these unexplored regions may be speedily opened to intercourse with the civilized world. Access to these ancient manuscripts, which are probably older than any others now extant, would be of great value in correcting the received Hebrew text, or in throwing light upon doubtful passages. What a door of hope for Africa would be opened by their conversion to Christianity.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, March 31, 1853.

"JEWISH AND CHRISTIAN SABBATH."

Whoever attended the lecture of the Rev. Dr. Potts, on the evening of the 20th inst., in the expectation of hearing a discussion of the questions naturally involved in his subject, was most egregiously hoaxed. We must say, that we were never more thoroughly disappointed. His text was, "The Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath," (Luke 6 : 5,) and we did expect some attempt at showing how the Son of Man, in the exercise of his authority as Lord, instituted a Sabbath of his own, to take the place of the one which had always been observed by the Jews. Certainly, this was what the announcement of his subject virtually promised. But, in our opinion, he took the most effectual method he possibly could have taken to show, that the Sabbath is now just what it was from the beginning. "In supporting the authority of the Christian Sabbath," said he, "I plant myself upon the morality and immutability of the fourth of the moral laws of God." "I take my stand upon the original, absolute, and immutable nature of the law itself. Moses did not originate it, but merely republished it. I claim for it all the authority which belongs to its associate laws, all of which have been held as universally true, as suitable, and as binding, as if there had never been a Jewish nation or a Jewish economy." "Like all the other laws found in company with it, the design and operation of this law proves its moral, perpetual, and obligatory character." "The Christian Church is bound by the sabbatical law, and that law has not been abrogated by any authority. There is no principle of limitation. It was recognized by Christ, and observed by the Apostles, and has been transmitted to the Church of all ages."

Certainly, principles like these would lead any logical mind to the inference, that the popular distinction of Jewish and Christian Sabbath is a mere fiction—a distinction which has no real existence. If the Sabbath which binds the Church is the Sabbath of the Decalogue, then it never was Jewish, nor is it now Christian; and the most charitable thing that we can say of those who are always mouthing these epithets is, that they use terms without meaning any thing by them. For if the terms do mean any thing, they must mean that the Jewish Sabbath is not the Christian Sabbath. For whatever analogy or similarity there may be between them, they are as different as a sour apple is different from a sweet one, or as a green apple is different from a ripe one. Two apples may correspond to each other very closely in appearance, size, weight, color, and structure; yet they are certainly different apples; one is sweet, the other sour—one is ripe, the other green. And even Dr. Potts himself might demur, if we should argue, from a law binding him to eat the sweet one, that he was therefore bound to eat the sour one; or, from a law binding him to eat the ripe one, that he was under obligation to eat also the one that was green. He certainly would, if the fruit were persimmons instead of apples.

We say, the Sabbath never was Jewish, nor is it now Christian. It would be more correct to say, it is Human; for it was made for man. Strange it is, that our Puritan Divines will plant themselves upon the Saviour's declaration, and contend like giants that the Sabbath was made for the human race—for man as man, not as Jew, or as Christian—and then immediately face about, and talk of a Jewish Sabbath, and of a Christian Sabbath! True, their meaning is, that Jews had one day for sabbatizing, and that Christians have another; and by making a distinction between the holy rest itself, and the day which is appropriated for it, they fancy that they avoid all inconsistency. But this distinction is purely imaginary; it is borne out neither by Scripture, nor by good reason. All that we know about a Sabbath at all—all the reason we have for saying that one was ever instituted—is found in the fact, that God sanctified a certain definite and clearly specified period of time. That period was the seventh day of the week. Destroy this fact, and we have no Sabbath. Destroy it, and the Fourth Commandment means nothing. The sanctification of a rest, without including the particular period of time occupied by it, is an impossibility. Rest necessarily includes the portion of time through which it extends; and in order to secure the rest, the time itself must be sanctified.

Now, if any one looks attentively at the inspired record, he will find that God's rest occupied the last day of the first week of time. That day was, on that account, constituted holy in its weekly returns. The blessing of God did not fall upon the rest, but upon the day. "God blessed the seventh DAY, and sanctified IT, because that in it he had rested from all his work which he had made." That he blessed the holy rest, apart from the day, is not in the record. And as it was for man's sake that the blessing was given, it must have been given to, or taken effect upon, something of which man could avail himself. To avail himself of rest abstractly—that is, of rest without time—is impossible.

It appears, then, that the distinction between the holy rest itself, and the particular day on which it is to be observed, is a mere abstraction; practically, it is out of the question. Our Puritanic Divines do not, and cannot, by this abstraction, relieve themselves of inconsistency. If the Sabbath is perpetual, it is perpetual because the time which was originally sanctified is holy still. For as the sanctification of the time was what gave existence to the Sabbath in the first place, so the continued holiness of that time is what renders the Sabbath perpetual. The holiness of the time being destroyed, the institution itself is destroyed.

For these reasons, we consider that the great body of Dr. Potts' discourse was a complete refutation of his own practice, and of all he said, or possibly can say, in behalf of the so-called Christian Sabbath. But as he tells us that the Sabbath is perpetual, and insists upon it, it must be that, when he talks of Jewish and Christian Sabbath, he does not mean what he says. He must mean Jewish day of the Sabbath, and Christian day of the Sabbath. But as 'day of the Sabbath' and 'Sabbath-day' are terms so nearly synonymous that we cannot see the difference, it would seem to follow that, in contending for the Sabbath as a perpetual and unchangeable institution, Dr. P. does not mean to contend for the Sabbath-day, but only for the Sabbatic rest. Does he contend for the Fourth Commandment, then? For that says, "Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy." A pretty spectacle, truly! A Rev. Doctor of Divinity contending with all his might for the Sabbatic institution, and yet not contending for the Sabbath-day!—for the holy rest, and yet not for the Fourth Commandment which says "Remember the Rest-day!"

We must give Dr. P. the credit, however, of so far noticing the question involved in his subject, as to say, that 'whoever objected to the Christian Sabbath, on the ground that the day was different from that of the old Sabbath, offered a very trifling objection, and one that was justified neither by the letter nor the spirit of the Fourth Commandment.' We do not pretend to give his precise words, as we took no notes, and have to rely wholly on our memory; but we think this was his language substantially. If he really believed what he said, (and he seemed to,) we hazard nothing in saying, that the Rev. Doctor never thoroughly investigated this question. He averred that even the letter of the commandment required nothing but the consecration to God of one day in seven, or the seventh part of time. But let him look at the commandment again. It requires the commemoration, in its weekly returns, of "the Sabbath-day;" that is, of the Rest-day. Of what rest-day? 'Why, of that rest-day which God has appointed,' you will answer. No, sir, that is not the meaning. The language points definitely to that particular day upon which God himself rested, as the day to be remembered and kept holy in its weekly return. Whoever makes the language refer to any other day, wrests it from its proper meaning. The attempt to make it refer to the first, or to any other day of the week except the last, is an attempt to make the Fourth Commandment utter a lie. "Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy," means simply this: "Remember the day of the week on which Jehovah the Creator rested, to keep it holy in its weekly returns."

One thing we took notice of; the Rev. Dr. seemed to be somewhat vexed, that there was a class of persons so unreasonable as to demand an express law for every observance imposed upon them. Indeed, his feelings waxed quite warm while discussing this point. And, conscious, probably, that the great body of his hearers were thorough-going Pedobaptists, he took good care to avail himself of the ad captandum argument, found in their prejudices against those who reject infant baptism. This was a master-stroke, and was, no doubt, considered very conclusive. All we have to say is, that when we are called to practice that which involves downright disobedience to a plain law of God, we shall demand "an express law." Infant sprinkling has led to the displacement of believer baptism, as far as it has obtained currency, and is therefore downright rebellion against the law of Christ's house. So has Sunday keeping led to the rejection of the Sabbath, and is such a manifest rebellion against "the fourth of the moral laws of God," that no efforts to promote Sabbath reformation can be of lasting benefit, so long as it continues. When we are called upon to keep holy the first day of the week, we feel that we are called upon to disobey the law of the Sabbath, and we do demand an express warrant for it.

REVIVAL AT INDEPENDENCE.

INDEPENDENCE, March 22, 1853.

It may be interesting to the readers of the Sabbath Recorder to know, that the Church in Independence, Allegany Co., N. Y., is enjoying a season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. The revival influence first manifested itself in the established prayer and Sabbath meetings. About this time, Elder H. W. Babcock came here, from a point on the field of his missionary labor, where he had recently been attacked by a severe sickness, intending to remain a short time to regain his wasted strength. As soon as he became able to preach, that part of the labor was committed to him; and during his stay, God prospered the word in his hand, making him an instrument to promote the work of his grace. The leading of Providence seemed to indicate the propriety of assembling more frequently for worship, and we were not slow to respond to the indication, in the appointment of evening meetings; nor was our Heavenly Father slow to pronounce his approval and blessing upon the response. Sinners were at once "pricked in their hearts," and said, "What must we do to be saved," and being assured of the strong consolation which God has offered, "fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before them in the Gospel." Thus, the awakening of the drowsy, the return of the prodigal to his Father's house, and the conversion of sinners, were simultaneous.

It is an interesting fact, that nearly all the scholars in the Sabbath-School, that are old enough to understand the effects of sin upon the heart, give evidence of being born again. The circumstance that they were among the first awakened to a sense of their hopeless condition while out of Christ, is calculated to encourage those who are laboring in the Sabbath-School enterprise. From these, the work spread to a wider circle, including stout-hearted sinners; and though, in their opposition to the Gospel, the struggle was fearful, God humbled their pride, changed their hearts, and attuned their tongues to speak his praise.

The Church, quite generally, have partaken of the spirit of awakening, and twenty-four have been added by baptism, three of whom embraced the Sabbath. There are a number of others that have professed hope, who are, we trust, like Saul, inquiring what the Lord would have them do. May they be guided, in their search for truth, by "the wisdom which cometh down from above." There are others, with whom, we hope, the Spirit is striving. Our daily prayer is, that the good work may be extended in every direction, and that God's name be glorified in the conversion of many souls.

Sunday Movements—Bible Jubilee Meeting—The Madiai—Jewish Disabilities, &c.

GLASGOW, March 11th, 1853.

A few petitions, and only a few as yet, against the Sunday opening of the Crystal Palace, have been presented to the House of Commons, with little comment. The Bill relative to the powers of the Palace Co. has not yet been brought into Parliament, although there was an expectation that it would have been, and doubts expressed as to whether any clause authorizing the Sunday opening would then be proposed. The fears as well as the discussions on the question are exposing some of the inconsistencies, both in the church's creed and the church's practice. The editor of the Record this week confesses that the question so often put by the working men at the meetings relative to Sunday observance, "Why don't you find fault with the Bishops for riding about in their coaches on Sunday?" is a pertinent question, and that success, if not consistency, demands that the occasion for the question shall be removed.

Another effort was yesterday made, at the meeting of the Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee Railway, to put a stop to its Sunday traffic. An attempt had been made by the church party to take the meeting by surprise. They had previously prepared the way by secretly sending out proxies to those of the proprietors believed to be friendly to their views—at a period so nearly approaching that of the meeting, that proxies could not legally be issued by their opponents. They outwitted themselves, however. The motion, as previously entered, was "that the officials of the Company shall not be worked on the Sabbath"—meaning thereby, of course, Sunday instead. Their Act of Parliament, however, makes it compulsory upon the Company, that a certain number of passages be made by their steam ferry-boats between Granton and Burntisland, and also that there be certain trains on the line, on Sundays. The Chairman, therefore, declared the motion incompetent; and the mover was not permitted to alter it from what was set down, although desirous of rendering it more in accordance with their act of incorporation.

A meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and termed their "Great Jubilee Meeting," it being fifty years since its commencement, was held in London on the 8th instant. The Earl of Shaftesbury was in the chair, and the principal speakers were the Duke of Argyle, the Earl of Carlisle, and the Rev. J. A. James, and A. Stowell, the Bishop of Winchester, and Doctors Duff and Cumming. It was stated, that the Scriptures have been printed in 148 languages or dialects, 121 of which languages had not before appeared in print. Forty-three millions of copies of the Scriptures, in whole or in part, have been circulated. All the speakers urged the right of private judgment, and individual responsibility to do so; and the case of the Madiai was referred to, in proof that the Church of Rome is afraid of the light.

All the efforts made to prevent the reading of the word of God, in Papal and despotic states, seem to fail. In his addresses to public meetings, Captain Trotter, who was one of the deputation that went to Tuscany in behalf of the Madiai, states that after careful inquiry and diligent search, he believes that there are in Tuscany 20,000 at present Protestants who, four years ago, were Roman Catholics. An executioner has been appointed at £10 a month, and a machine erected in a part of Tuscany for the execution of such offenders. The Captain does not expect that the Madiai can survive their imprisonment. Rosa herself, in a letter at the beginning of the year, remarking that they then had been confined seventeen months, adds, that they "are reduced to skin and bone." M. Colombe, chaplain of the Prussian Embassy at Florence, speaks favorably of the kindness of the governors of the two penitentiaries in which they are confined; that the food given to Francesco is of good quality and suitable to his state of health; and that Rosa has, through the doctor's interposition, been excused from the regulation prison food, and that both prisoners are allowed, from time to time, some delicate food. Mr. C. sees the husband only once a month, but the friends of the wife are allowed to visit her four times a month. Their religious convictions, he adds, are respected, and no effort is made to bring them back to the Church of Rome. He testifies to the faith, hope, and charity of both. In the March number of Evangelical Christendom, however, their Florence correspondent, of date Feb. 14, remarks, that the prisoners are refused their demand "to have the Bible and their books of devotion." He states that "the laws concede to Protestant criminals the use of their own books of devotion; but in the case of the Madiai, the government made a distinction between Protestants who were born such, and those who had become Protestants by apostacy."

It does not appear as if the Grand Duke were disposed to yield the point of the release of these faithful ones, not even if, as Sir John Russell desired Sir H. Bulwer to inform him, "throughout the civilized world this example of religious persecution excite abhorrence." In such circumstances, seeing that all remonstrances prove unavailing, Protestant states, if they were really such, would surely be justified in intimating that they would withdraw from diplomatic relations with a government that would persist in such a course.

Our Jewish Disabilities Bill, which passed the second reading in the House of Commons, has now been published. It seems simply to afford opportunity for Jews getting into Parliament. They are not to be permitted to hold certain offices in the State, nor to advise in the appointments of offices in the Church.

The death of the Bishop of Lincoln has led to the appointment of Dr. Jackson as his successor. The appointment is said to have been the occasion of much dissension in the Cabinet—the Tractarian members, of whom Mr. Gladstone is chief, having fought hard to obtain the dignity for Dr. Hook, of Leeds.

CHINA MISSION.

From a letter of Bro. Carpenter, recently received, dated Shanghae, Nov. 9, 1852, we make the following extract:—

"The 5th, 6th and 7th days of last month we spent in a trip to the hills, which lie in a nearly western direction from Shanghae, at a distance of about thirty miles. Although the highest is scarcely four hundred feet in hight, there is nothing that we have met with in this monotonous country, that has awakened such home-like feelings as the sight of these hills, even in the distance. And when we came to ramble upon their summits, it was truly exhilarating. There are about a dozen of them, and all within a circle of perhaps fifteen or twenty miles. The sides of some of them were covered with forests of bamboo, and other trees, in their wild state. But, for the most part, they were bare of trees, and covered with a light pasturage, and in many places the bare rocks were visible. They rise abruptly from the midst of a vast plain as level as a house floor; and that plain is an immense rice field. The rocks at the base of the hills, and the rice, stand in juxta-position. The top of the highest is occupied with an idol temple, and is so steep that ascent and descent are somewhat difficult. The almost giddy hight once gained, the landscape below is most delightful. It is every where sprinkled over with thrifty-looking hamlets, and marked with canals winding in every direction. But all else, excepting the few hills around us, were fields loaded with a heavy crop of rice, just ready for the sickle, and stretching out on the north, east, south, and west, till they were lost in the distant horizon. Never did the sun, it seemed to us, shine on a more beautiful prospect. Never was a people blessed with a richer heritage. O, when shall this vast garden of the world raise the grand chorus of praise to Him who is, as yet, its unknown Husbandman? The time will come. But let us see; what have we to do in this matter? Are the people friendly and approachable? We found them so. We found numerous opportunities of introducing religious conversation, and our message was listened to, sometimes by small groups, and sometimes by large ones, and generally with better attention than in Shanghae. Had we the men and means, we might have a hundred men threading these numerous canals, hunting out the lost ones, and laboring to lead them back to God.

"On the 18th of last month, Mrs. C. and I, in company with Le-Chong and Ur-Lo, took a sail past Woo-Sung, up the mouth of the Yang-Tse-Kiang, to the village of Lee-oo. It is the home of Le-Chong, and about forty English miles by water from Shanghae. It contains upwards of twenty thousand inhabitants. Immediately upon our arrival, which was about 4 o'clock P. M., our cook conducted me to the court of the temple of the Queen of Heaven, as the most convenient place for a large concourse to assemble. In a few minutes there were nearly a thousand people, of all grades except the mandarins, assembled, and all stood as near me as their bones would permit them. They behaved so orderly that, although there were so many, I had but little difficulty in being heard by the most of them for the space of about half an hour, and when done, I appointed another meeting at the same place, at early candle light, in the evening. On returning to the boat, I had the pleasure of addressing about two hundred attentive listeners, who stood on the shore. Then we went a little way into the country, to visit the family of our cook. An elephant would not probably have attracted so much attention as a foreign woman. When we had walked more than a mile, we came to our destination, and were cordially received, but so thronged that visiting was out of the question. Here I addressed about two hundred more. After a few friendly words with the family of Le-Chong, we left them, not without anxious hearts for their salvation, and returned to the boat. After tea, I went out to meet the appointment, and found two or three hundred, but not quite so orderly as in the day-time. I called upon those present to defend the claims of the Queen of Heaven, before whose temple we were assembled. But as no one volunteered, I went on to speak of One whose claims upon our regard could be set forth in order. Next morning we left very early, and arrived home at about 2 o'clock P. M., having been absent about thirty-two hours.

"Nov. 2d, at 12 o'clock in the night, I delivered to the proper authorities, for correction, a young man, a near neighbor of ours. We had been annoyed for some time in a way that made it evident that somebody was trying to have a little sport at our expense. That night I set a watch, and having caught this fellow in the act, we immediately took him to the office of the city magistrate. He was let off next day with a fine of a few dollars, and since that the trouble has ceased.

"I preach in the Chapel, sometimes once, sometimes twice a week. Our congregations are generally small, from twenty to sixty. But we have this for our encouragement, that when we do our part well, we are generally listened to with attention, at least by a part of the congregation. In this department of our labor, we have to walk by faith, not by sight; for no one seems really to believe our report.

"On the evening after last Sabbath, I went to Sa-hwa Jau, the tea-shop out in the country, formerly spoken of in my letters. There seems to be some advantage in having an acquaintance of some standing; for I could hardly expect to receive such attention, even in a new place, unless at a greater distance from Shanghae. The farmers of the neighborhood had assembled to take their tea, and have a social time at a game resembling the game of dice among western nations. Here they play for money. There were about sixty thus employed. But by a few gentle requests, and becoming interested in the thread of my story, they were induced, one group after another, to knock off and listen; and I have not often been better gratified with the attention paid."

BRITISH AND AMERICAN SLAVERY.

Considerable notice is taken in England of the letter recently published in this country, purporting to be the reply of the women of America to the address of the women of England on the subject of Slavery. The Earl of Shaftesbury, in a letter to the Times, says, that if it had been the production of American ladies, he "would have regarded it with much respect and deference;" but from the general character of the document, he infers, "that no woman had any share whatever in its spirit and composition." The general doctrine of the letter—that England has evils as glaring as those of American slavery, and therefore English ladies had better expend their sympathies at home—is not admitted by the Earl. On this point he says:—

"We have had, and we still have, in England, many evils, but we are now doing our best to remove them. They have had, and they still have, in America, a great evil, which they not only will not endeavor to remove, but they make it daily worse (witness their Fugitive Slave Law), reviling, moreover, and persecuting, every one who ventures to jog their memories on things of vital importance to the temporal and eternal interests of the human race."

Of Lord Shaftesbury's claim to be heard with kindliness and respect by right-minded Americans, the London Christian Times says:

"Admitting for a moment that the Englishman must be dumb on witnessing human degradation and suffering, however intense, if beyond his own shores, because there is a degree of suffering and degradation in England, even then we would humbly submit, that the silencing 'Look at home!' cannot fairly be applied to those who originated this address. Who, let it be asked, was it that successfully led the movement against the factory abuses of former years? Who has shortened the hours of labor and cared for the interest of the young employed in factories? Who is it that has descended into the mines and carried inspection there? Who has been foremost among the members of the Church of England to promote Church Reform, and to protest against mere Ritualism? Who has cared for the children of the outcasts of society, and founded Ragged Schools? Who has aided in the establishment of City Missions and Christian Instruction Societies? Who was it that separated himself from political connexions, and surrendered the representation of his own county, rather than be one to uphold 'protection,' which taxed the food of the people for the supposed interests of his class? Who but honored Lord Ashley—the Earl of Shaftesbury—and he it was that prompted those noble but like-minded ladies to address, in the gentlest spirit of Christian charity, their sisters, the women of the United States."

PROMPT RESPONSE.—On the 25th of March we received a letter dated Westerly, R. I., March 24th, saying: "Inclosed please find two dollars, contributed by a few sisters, who request you to send twelve copies of the Sabbath-School Visitor to the Sabbath-School at Dakota, Wis., noticed in the Sabbath Recorder of this date. If the request has been responded to before this reaches you, please send them a copy of the Recorder for one year, as we think the information derived from that will benefit them more than so small an amount invested in Sabbath-School books."

RETURN OF A MISSIONARY.—Mr. Jacob Rambo, formerly of Woodbury, N. J., has returned to that place from Africa, where he was sent as a missionary of the Episcopal Church three or four years ago. He says that the cause of Christianity is flourishing there, and the missionaries are enjoying good health. He will return in a short time to the field of his efforts.

LECTURES ON POPERY.

Father Gavazzi, the Italian orator, after awakening much interest by his lectures in England, has come to this country, and commenced a series of lectures at the Broadway Tabernacle in New York. His watchword is, Destruction to Popery! The scope of his lectures may be learned from the following list of subjects on which he proposes to treat:

The Bible and the Papal System.
The Pope and his Double-headed Supremacy.
Monks and Nuns.
Transubstantiation.
Popedom.
Auricular Confession.
The Worship of the Virgin Mary and Saints—St. Patrick especially.
The Papal System, its Intolerance and Slavery.
The Inquisition.
Italy.

A meeting to welcome Gavazzi to this country was held at the Tabernacle one evening last week, when speeches were made by Drs. Cox, Cheever, and Dowling, and a paper was read, giving a brief statement of some of the principal events in the life of Father Gavazzi. He was the second son of a family of twenty children, and became a monk at the early age of sixteen. When but twenty years of age, he filled the chair of rhetoric and belles-lettres in a college at Naples. Soon after this he was ordained preacher, and removed to Leghorn. From there he went to Piedmont, where his peculiarly earnest and eloquent style of preaching attracted to him immense numbers of hearers. Here he incurred the jealousy of the Jesuits, and being obliged to leave the place, went to Parma, where he continued to preach with eminent success, speaking frequently as many as ten times a day. About this time, his liberal views having attracted the attention of Pope Gregory XVI., and somewhat aroused the attention of this pontiff, he was imprisoned, and was allowed to preach only to the prisoners, of whom there were a large number confined. Being finally released, he went to Rome, where he commenced preaching again. While here, a day was set apart by some of the citizens for the purpose of celebrating and commemorating the memory of those who fell at Padua. Father Gavazzi turned out and joined this party. For this cause, and for his liberal manner of preaching, he was imprisoned. Being at last released, he was the first to move in the great cause of Freedom, which was at that time waking up. He was the first man who paraded in the streets of Rome with the emblematic colors upon his breast. He carried the cross, which was his sole defense, and exposed himself fearlessly in the cause of truth. He preached the crusade of freedom to all men. He did much toward combining the forces of Italy against the Austrian armies. When the French army entered Rome, he was a proscribed man; but, under the protection of the American flag, he was got away from Rome, generous hearts welcomed him in England, and from there he has come to our shores.

LICENSE LAW OF 1801.—The following very strong oath was prescribed to the Commissioners of Excise by the Statute of New York State in 1801:—

"I do solemnly swear, in the presence of Almighty God, that I will not, on any account or pretence whatsoever, grant any license to any person within the said town of ——, for the purpose of keeping an inn or tavern, except where it shall appear to me to be absolutely necessary for the benefit of travelers."

Under this law (says the Christian Advocate) all mere grog-shops were impossible, unless the Commissioners perjured themselves. Half the fine for violating the law went to the complainant, and all the costs were to be paid by the defendant. Such a law, if administered by a conscientious man, would be equivalent to a total prohibition of the retail traffic, because he could not swear that intoxicating liquors are ever "absolutely necessary for the benefit of travelers." If any class of people ought to be protected from the loaferism and crime incident to the liquor traffic, travelers constitute that class. Of all places in the world, taverns are the last that should be allowed to embark in this nefarious business.

LIBERAL BEQUESTS.—Among the public bequests of the late Samuel S. Howland, Esq., of this City, whose decease in Italy has recently been announced, are the following to charitable institutions in the City of New York:—

Institution for the Blind	$1,000
Institution for the Deaf and Dumb	1,000
Society for the Relief of Respectable Aged and Indigent Females	1,000
Orphan Asylum	1,500
Half-Orphan Asylum	1,500
Colored Orphan Asylum	1,500
American Bible Society	2,500
American Tract Society	2,500
American Home Missionary Society	2,500
Foreign Missions	2,500
Central Education Society	2,500
Total	$20,000

DEATH OF A VENERABLE LADY.—Mrs. Ruth Ballou, widow of the late Rev. Hosea Ballou, died on the 1st March, in Boston, aged 74. She was married at 18, and was 55 years a loving and exemplary wife. Six children, two sons-in-law, and one daughter-in-law, stood by her tranquil and happy death-bed. One of her sons said of her to a friend:

"I never heard my mother speak ill of a human being! If people were blamed for manifest wrong-doing within her hearing, she always found some palliating circumstance, and pitied more than she blamed! I never heard my mother speak one harsh word to one of her children, or to any one!"

MRS. STOWE.—Some time ago it was announced, that Mrs. Stowe would sail for England in the steamer Glasgow, March 26th. She did not go, however, and the Independent of last week says that her health is not now adequate to the voyage, but she hopes to be well enough to sail in a few weeks. The voyage is not given up. The "Key" to the Cabin is finished, and will be published in a few days.

General Intelligence.

European News.

We have European news to March 12, being one week later. The substance of it will be found below.

Two more members of the British Parliament, Messrs. Heyworth and Horsfall, of Derby, have been unseated for election bribery.

There is a bill pending in the House of Lords to make the vaccination of children compulsory.

The Greenland Whale Fishing fleet, amounting to twenty-six, sailed from Peterhead on the 27th and 28th ult.

Four men were killed by the explosion of a locomotive at Longsight Station, near Manchester, and an accident happened to the Birmingham and Bristol Railway train on the 9th, by the breaking of an axle of the locomotive. Two or three persons were killed and a good many injured. There have been numerous railway casulties in England of late.

A woman was taken sick lately, and carried to the Hospital of La Salpetiere, where, believing that she was on the point of death, she disclosed to a sister in attendance that her mind was burdened with a political secret—that, in fact, she was acquainted with the man who, in the insurrection of 1848, shot the Archbishop of Paris. As the woman persisted in the accusation, the person she named, a retired gentleman, has been arrested, and is to be immediately brought to trial on the charge of having taken part in the insurrection of June, and of having assassinated, or taken part in the assassination, of the Archbishop.

Ahmed, Caliph of Medjana, in Algiers, lately came to Paris to pay his respects to the Emperor, but on the way back to Africa died of apoplexy. His obsequies were celebrated at Marseilles with great military pomp.

Typhus fever and influenza are raging in the provinces at present, as well as in Paris.

In Germany, the eminent philosopher of Heidelberg, Gervinus, has been acquitted of treason and found guilty of sedition, and sentenced to two months imprisonment. His crime is the writing and publication of a book, to prove that the best political constitution is that of a federal republic.

Baron Christian Leopold Von Vock, the celebrated Geologist, died at Berlin on the 4th inst., aged 79.

The Emperor of Austria has got well of his wound, but it is said that his mind, never beyond the usual strength of the Hapsburg family, is seriously affected.

The King of Naples has been shot in the leg by an assassin, and the limb so injured as to render amputation necessary.

Mazzini has got off from Genoa on an English steamer bound for Malta, and several other revolutionists have been taken on board the American frigates Cumberland and St. Louis.

From Pesth, 1st inst., it was stated that Noslopy, chief of guerillas, and three of his accomplices, one of whom was tutor to Kossuth's children, were to be executed on the 3d. Accounts via 5th, say that the execution took place at Pesth on the day specified, the victims being Charles Juhbal, ex-tutor to Kossuth's family, Charles Andrassfy von Deveny-ujfala, Caspar Noslopy, and Samuel Sarkozy.

The North of Portugal has been visited by an immense fall of snow. Several wine carriers and their mules have perished in the drifts. The wolves had descended from the mountains in search of prey, and in country places many of the houses were snowed over. At Lisbon the weather was unusually cold for the season, and much sickness prevailed.

The Berlin Police have just done a smart thing. A Jew, occupying an old, dilapidated house in an obscure street, and suspected as a receiver of stolen goods, was secretly arrested during the night and carried off to prison. His shop, however, the Police opened next morning, as usual, and a Policeman, disguised as a Jew, took up his position behind the counter, while several others of the force secreted themselves in the cellar. It was not long before customers began to make their appearance. They were politely requested to step into the cellar, where the owner of the store was busy, and would make the trade. There the unsuspecting customers were seized, gagged, and handcuffed, and kept till they could be conveyed, at night, unobserved, to prison. By this stratagem, the Police succeeded in entrapping not only the chief professional thieves, with full evidence against them, but also several employees who were in the habit of robbing their masters.

The Philadelphia Murder.—The atrocious murder of two women in Philadelphia, was announced some three weeks ago. The supposed murderer has been tried and found guilty. His name was Spring, and the principal witness against him was his own son, a lad of seventeen years, upon whom the father attempted to fix suspicion. Some years ago Spring was charged with the murder of his wife, but escaped the gallows because the only positive witness against him was this son, whose evidence was rejected on account of his extreme youth. Circumstances have transpired since Spring's conviction which fix upon him suspicion of other awful deeds.

Mr. Lynch, the husband of one of the murdered women, had recently been paid off for services in the U. S. Navy, and had gone to New York. Mr. Carroll and wife, the only other occupants of the house in which Lynch's family lived, had gone to a party. On returning, the Carrolls found Mrs. Lynch and her sister lying dead on the floor, with numerous wounds upon them; and the house had been fired, but the fire had gone out. The following are the main links in the chain which connected Spring with the tragedy.

On the evening of the murder, Spring tied his head up, under pretence of indisposition, and induced his son to believe that he had gone to bed. He went out, however, and returned home late in the evening. Young Spring was up stairs. The father came up in the dark, with his boots in his hand; he imposed silence on the boy, and handed him some pieces of gold, which he told him to put away and say nothing about. Spring and the son were meanwhile in the dark together; he told the boy to get him a basin of water, which he did, and the father took it and washed his hands in the dark. The father afterwards returned to the room occupied by his son and himself, and walked the floor; he was much agitated, and could not rest. After a time Spring struck a light, and the son then saw blood upon the wristbands and bosom of his father's shirt! In the morning the miserable man gave his son a $10 gold piece, and directed him to go out and buy two shirts—one for himself and the other for the boy; this was done, and his father divested himself of his bloody garment. To make assurance doubly sure, the storekeeper who sold the shirts has been found, and his recollection of the circumstance comports precisely with the boy's statement. Spring told his son (so the latter declares,) that he had stolen the gold from Carroll's house; he said he knew Lynch had it in the house, and he was also acquainted with the fact that the Carrolls were going to the ball; he had watched the house, he said, until no person but the females were in it, when he went in and took the money.

Newspaper By-Laws.—A cotemporary lays down the following pithy code of newspaper by-laws. They are the best we have seen drawn up :—

1. Be brief. This is the age of telegraphs and stenography. 2. Be pointed. Don't write all around a subject without hitting it. 3. State facts, but don't stop to moralize. It's a drowsy subject. Let the reader do his own dreaming. 4. Eschew prefaces. Plunge at once into your subject, like a swimmer into cold water. 5. If you have written a sentence that you think particularly fine, draw your pen through it. A pet child is always the worst in the family. 6. Condense. Make sure that you really have an idea, and then record it in the shortest possible terms. We want thoughts in their quintessence. 7. When your article is completed, strike out nine tenths of the adjectives. The English is a strong language, but won't bear much "reducing." 8. Avoid all high-flown language. The plainest Anglo-Saxon words are the best. Never use stilts when legs will do as well. 9. Make your sentences short. Every period is a milestone, at which the reader may halt and rest himself. 10. Write legibly. Don't let your manuscript look like the tracks of a spider half drowned in ink. We shan't mistake any one for a genius, though he writes as crabbedly as Napoleon.

Transporting Gold.—The free and easy manner in which our people transmit immense sums of gold, is a matter of much surprise to strangers. Not long since, one of the Southern Express Companies was requested to bring from Philadelphia to this City, one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars in newly minted gold, weighing over forty-six hundred pounds. Three wagons backed up to the door of the mint, having no guards or watchmen, except a driver for each. The gold, which was in bags, was thrust into the wagons like so many bags of salt, and driven to the office of the Company, where it was put in a large chest and sent to the boat. Lest the weight of the mass should break the gang plank, the chest was unlocked, and the bags handed out in the midst of a promiscuous multitude, without even the apprehension of danger. On arriving at New York, the yellow dirt was carted to its owners in the same unpretending manner, none of the persons concerned in its transmission seeming to feel any unusual responsibility or importance from the fact of having two tons of gold in their charge. In Europe, this would have been carried in solemn procession, between double ranks of police or gendarmes, while in Mexico it would have demanded for its protection a regiment of soldiers. [Tribune.

Express Facilities.—The N. O. Crescent, in an article noticing the facilities of the Express system, extracts the following item from one of Harnden's way bills :—

"One young lady, as per telegraphic order, charges $169 08, freight $80."

On inquiry, we learned that the express had been employed by telegraphic message to find this lady's residence, pay all her outstanding debts, and forward her without delay, and had fulfilled the commission to the letter. We submitted to the agent of the express the difficulty of securing the payment of the charges on such movable freight; but he pointed to the mysterious letters, C. O. D., appearing on the margin of the way bill, signifying "collect on delivery," and hinted that, in the event of difficulty with the consignee, the express might legally detain the baggage.

Blind Harry gone Aloft.—Henry Franklin, the Blind Sailor, who used to be seen selling cigars from the steps of public buildings in this City, (led and guided by his faithful dog Jack, who, with the most devoted attachment to his master's interest, caught or picked up the coppers or the silver which the curious or the charitable had thrown to him for his master's dependent family,) died on Sunday evening, March 20, of the disease with which he has been afflicted for years past, aneurism of the heart. His death was peaceful and happy; his faith firm and unflinching. He remarked but a few hours previous to his death, "I am waiting to go; I am all right; my anchor is in the right place; it holds good." As a friend bade him farewell, he said, "I shall be gone before you return; but I will see you on the other side. Once I was blind, but now I see."

A Mute Convention.—The Montpelier Watchman gives an account of the proceedings of a Mute Convention, which assembled in that village on Wednesday week. It was composed of some seventy or eighty deaf mutes, of both sexes, from different States, but principally from Vermont. The objects of the Convention were mutual improvement, and the raising of funds for the erection of a monument to the memory of their much beloved teacher. The Watchman says the proceedings were extremely interesting to themselves, and quite as much so to the inhabitants of the village, who witnessed the silent communication of ideas by signs, and partook of the spirit of devotion as prayer was offered to Him who hears the thoughts of the sincere heart as readily when conveyed by signs, as when uttered by the tongue.

A poor widow was asked how she became so much attached to a certain neighbor, and replied, that she was bound to him by several cords of wood, which he had sent her during a hard winter.

SUMMARY.

The express train from Utica to Syracuse, was thrown off the track near Oneida on Friday evening, in consequence of one of the rails being broken. The engine was thrown nearly upside down, and the tender directly across the track. The fireman, named Joseph Nicholls, was so severely scalded by the steam which escaped from a breach in the dome of the boiler, that he died in about two hours. The engineer, Elisha Everett, was also dangerously scalded, but there is hope of his recovery. No material injury was done to any of the passengers, neither were any of the cars damaged, except that containing the baggage.

The Newark Mercury says that "it is a pretty figure of rhetoric to say that a country is adorned by a net-work of Railroads; but in describing New Jersey, the expression would be more veracious were it changed into 'New Jersey is entangled in a net of Railroads.' In the present crisis of our State Independence, the extent, nature and details of this entanglement become a matter of anxious inquiry. Not one man in a thousand can form any idea of the intricate connections and subterraneous ramifications by which the central power in Princeton can direct the movements of its puppets in almost every township."

It appears by the recent report of the Trustees of Mount Auburn Cemetery, that more than $160,000 have been expended in the general improvements of the place, independent of private operations. The following items are given: cost of gate, $9,500; do. iron fence, $28,000; do. wooden fence, $6,500; do. chapel, $26,000; do. tower, when finished, $19,000; do. well-house, $3,000. To this is to be added the cost of draining, laying out walks, planting trees, embellishing, &c. The Corporation has now an available fund of $43,637 72, to which may be added about 50 acres of unsold land on the premises.

A heart-rending casualty occurred recently near Portland, Me. A gentleman left the city with his wife and infant child in a sleigh, to go to his residence, a few miles out of town. In order to shield the infant from the weather, it was wrapped up very closely, and as it remained quiet, they supposed it was asleep; but arriving at their place of destination, it was taken from its manifold wrappers, when the fearful fact became apparent that it had been smothered to death. The infant was but four or five weeks old. The anguish of the parents can better be imagined than described.

The Superintendent of the Banking Department has given notice that the notes of the Farmers' Bank of Onondaga County will be redeemed out of the trust funds on hand, as soon as said funds can be converted into money. These funds, according to the last annual statement of the Superintendent, were: Bonds and mortgages, $50,317: New York State Fives, $17,000; New York States Sixes, $5,000; United States Fives, $17,800; United States Sixes, $12,000. Total, $102,117. Circulation, 81,000.

A man has been sentenced at Paris (France) to three years' imprisonment for selling quack medicines. Among his compositions were the "Water of Giants," to hasten the growth; "Water of Financiers," to strengthen the flesh; the "Elixir of Arabs," to fortify the voice; "Prodigal Son Pomatum," composed, suggests The Gazette Tribunaux, of the marrow of the fatted calf; and the "Oil of the Capuchins of Alsatia," to make the beard grow. It was shown that the waters and elixirs were either pure water or scented vinegars.

The Smyrna (Delaware) Herald says, that under the new law "no license to sell liquor at stores can be obtained unless the store-keeper procures the recommendation of a majority of the school voters, in the School District in which his store is situated, and he must also be a resident of the district. If we have not obtained a law similar in its provisions to the Maine Law, we have one that will prove prohibitory in many school districts in our State. It will no doubt diminish the number of rum-stores."

The publishers of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" say, in relation to the forthcoming "Key" to that work: "We commenced printing 20,000 copies for the first edition, but orders poured in so largely, that we were obliged to increase the edition to 40,000 copies, and these are nearly all ordered in advance of publication; and, from present appearances, we should not be surprised if we were compelled to increase the number to 60,000, before we can commence answering first orders.

A railroad train from Philipsburg, for New York, came in collision on the New Jersey Central Railroad, with a locomotive coming from Elizabethtown, and Mathias Johnson, baggage master, was instantly killed, and three other persons severely injured—one it is thought fatally. The engine coming toward Philipsburg had been reversed, and was detached from the tender by the concussion, when it went on toward New York at a rapid rate, without a conductor or guide. It however, fortunately, exhausted itself before meeting any other train.

The Banks of Ohio have made up their returns to the Auditor of the State to the first Monday in February. There are now four classes of Banks in the State, viz: five of the old chartered Banks, with a capital of $1,297,526; forty Branches of the State Bank, with an aggregate capital of $4,146,675; eleven Independent Banks, capital $754,180; and thirteen Free Banks, organized under the Free Bank Law of 1851, with a capital of $575,970.

The brig Yarmouth, Capt. Smith, of Salem, Mass., left Gibraltar for home on the 11th of January. On the 14th she encountered a heavy gale, and on the 15th foundered and sunk. There were twelve persons on board, three of whom—the Captain, steward, and James L. Jennings of New York—were saved by clinging to the floating mainmast until picked up by an English sloop-of-war, which took them back to Gibraltar.

Ice-cutting operations in this vicinity have been discontinued for the season. The result is stated to be, that not more than from one-third to one-half a crop has been housed, and that portion secured is generally of an inferior quality—lacking in thickness and solidity, and consequently more perishable.

The Catholics of Cincinnati are organizing an opposition to the Common School System. There is destined to be a severe struggle on that question. We trust the friends of Common Schools will not be intimidated, but be fully prepared to meet the issue manfully.

The decision of Judge Barculo has been given in a case which has excited great interest at Williamsburg. It relates to certain water grants at Green Point, Williamsburg and Bushwick Inlet, claimed by Samuel J. Hunt, Cornelius Dubois and James B. Taylor on one side, and John J. Schermerhorn and others on the other. The property involved is worth at least $200,000. The decision is in favor of the plaintiffs, Messrs. Hunt, Dubois & Taylor.

By the arrival of the Isabel at Charleston, we have news from Havana and Key West to the 22d inst. Mr. King's health was no better. There were rumors at Havana of a difficulty between the officers and men of a company stationed in the eastern part of the Island, and of farther landings of slaves. The commercial intelligence differs little from that brought by the Crescent City to this port.

Potter County, Pa., where no intoxicating liquor is sold, is attracting the attention of persons settling in Pennsylvania, as a place where life and property will be more secure, and the County taxes lighter, than elsewhere in that State. The Coroner's fees last year amounted to fifty cents. The expenses of Philadelphia County, caused by intoxicating liquors, would go far to purchase Potter County out and out.

The Cleveland Forest City says: A very considerable reduction of railway fare will take effect after the first of April. Through tickets from here (Cleveland) to Dunkirk, will be only $2 25, and $3 to Buffalo. From Cleveland to Cincinnati through tickets will not exceed $5 50. They are likely to sell considerably lower, as the Mad River Railway contemplates carrying passengers from Cincinnati to Sandusky.

J. D. Taylor, editor of The Times, Cincinnati, was presented, a few days since, with a magnificent service of silver, on which was engraved the following inscription: "Presented to J. D. Taylor for his manly and patriotic efforts in the support of the American system of Common Schools. Cincinnati, March 17, 1853."

Judge Beebe denied the motion to quash the indictment found by the late Grand Jury against Ald. James M. Bard, of the Fourteenth Ward. The Alderman must, therefore, stand trial. Ald. Smith, also indicted, signified his readiness to meet the charge. Both cases may probably come on in April.

The Grand Jury of Logan County, Ky., at the recent term of the Circuit Court, found a true bill against Presley Morris, a free man of color, for migrating to that State. The penalty is confinement in the Penitentiary. Morris gave "leg bail," and left for parts unknown.

The Milwaukee Wisconsin states that about two hundred thousand dollars of the notes of the banks which have lately failed, was in circulation in the interior of that State, mostly along the line of the Rock River Valley Union Railroad, where it had been used in paying off the laborers on the road.

The locomotive Oxford, drawing a heavy train on the Androscoggin and Kennebec Railroad, when near the Danville Junction, burst her boiler, shivering the machine to atoms. Mr. Frank, engineer, Mr. Stowe, conductor, and George Hilborn, fireman, were severally blown many feet into the air, but neither of them was fatally injured.

A course of Agricultural Lectures is to be given in the University of Michigan, (Ann Arbor,) commencing April 27, and closing June 28. The Chemistry of Soils and of Plants, Geology, Mineralogy, Botany, &c., will be thoroughly elucidated.

The Amherst (Mass.) Express states that wild-cats still infest the woods of Erving and the neighboring towns. One was recently killed in Erving, measuring from four to five feet in length. It had previously killed a sheep.

The Pittsfield (Ill.) Union states that a marriage recently came off near that town, between a couple whose united ages make one hundred and forty years. The bride is aged sixty-two, and the bridegroom seventy-eight.

The iron foundry of Ranstead, Dearborn & Co., Commercial Point, Dorchester, Mass., was destroyed by fire on the night of the 23d. Loss $45,000, on which there is $15,000 insurance in the Ætna office, Hartford.

The building occupied by the American Carpet Company at Rowbury, Mass., was entirely destroyed on the 20th ult. Loss $15,000, which is covered by insurance. Supposed to have been the work of an incendiary.

The Palmer Journal tells of a man who came quite a distance to have the death of his wife printed, with the expectation that he should get a shilling or two for his trouble.

Dr. Alexander Duncan, ex-member of Congress, was so severely injured by a wagon loaded with lumber passing over him near Cincinnati, that his recovery is almost hopeless.

Miss Roena Coulson recovered a verdict of $2,000 against A. B. Farquhar, at the late term of the Columbia County Common Pleas, for breach of marriage promise.

Another paddle-wheel for ocean steamers has been invented at Maumee, Ohio. It is designed to obviate the lift as the wheel leaves the water.

Goodell's "American Slave Code," so recently issued in this City, is already in process of republication by an efficient and enterprising publisher in London.

Elder Knapp has been preaching as an Evangelist, at Zanesville, Ohio, for several weeks, and 165 converts have been added to the church there.

The Maryland House of Delegates passed the bill granting the construction of the Susquehanna Bridge at Havre de Grace. Good news for the traveling public.

The contract for building the Mississippi and Milwaukee Railroad, from Milton to Madison, has been given to Chamberlain & Co., of Cleveland.

California and Australia Ticket Swindling is again rife in New York. Adventures should purchase at the proper offices of the regular lines, if they want to go through.

A case of slander was tried in New York last week, in which Henry C. Bowen was condemned to pay $6,000 for saying that Richard G. Fowles was a liar, &c.

A Washington dispatch says that Mr. Kennedy, the late Census Superintendent, has been arrested on a charge of abstracting public documents.

DIED,

In Andover, Allegany Co., N. Y., March 8th, 1853, Henry H. Clarke, son of Hazard P. and Phebe Clarke, aged 20 years and 10 months. His disease, at first, was pneumonia. When he was taken sick, he was under serious awakening, having been a constant attendant upon the meetings of the Church in Independence during a revival of religion. Though he had always been remarkable for the gravity of his deportment, when he felt the influence of the Holy Spirit upon his heart, he exhibited a determined opposition; frequently repulsing those who approached him upon the subject with an imperativeness hitherto unknown in his character. His trouble of mind followed him to his sick bed; but, flattering himself that he should recover, he wished to hear nothing upon the subject until he was better. When near the crisis of the disease, he was seized with spasm of the lungs, which rendered him speechless. At this time the danger of his situation flashed upon his mind. When he had so far recovered as to be able to speak, his mind evinced a state of terrible agony. His words seemed to be drenched in the gall of remorse. He reproached himself with having neglected the claims of God, and the interests of his soul, while he had opportunity to attend to them; "and now," he said, "it is too late." His mental emotions soon induced delirium, to which they seemed to give character. The spectacle was one which those who witnessed it desire never to see repeated. The case had attracted the attention and absorbed the interest of the whole community; and though an abatement of such a delirium, induced, apparently, by such a cause, at such a stage of the disease, was so little to be looked for, there was in the church a spirit of fervent supplication to God, that reason might be restored, and the cup of salvation once more pressed to his lips. His reason was restored at intervals, it is generally believed, in answer to prayer. During a part of each of the last three days of his life he was rational. The first time, on being pointed to the promises in the Gospel, he said he was seeking Jesus; and prayed audibly. The next day, on being asked if he had the evidence of forgiveness, he said, No; he thought he lacked faith; though he seemed to be much less agitated. His delirium, during its intervening periods, was much changed, wearing an aspect of comparative mildness. The day on which he died, he was calm, expressed hope in the Redeemer, and said he felt ready to die. His last audible words were, "I want to be with Christ." T. E. B.

In Pike Township, Clarke Co., Ohio, Feb. 21st, 1853, Samuel Lippincott, aged 93 years, 5 months, and 19 days. Father Lippincott was born in Monmouth Co., New Jersey. Though but a youth at the time, he took a decided stand against the oppressors of his country. At the age of fifteen years he was taken prisoner by the Tories, and confined in the city of New York. After peace was made between the hostile countries, he was released, and in a few years married. Feeling a desire to emigrate, he started with his wife and two children for the hill country of Virginia. He lived in Harrison county a number of years; but finally resolved to find a home in the new State of Ohio, where he ended his days. He was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church, and lived a devout Christian till he was called home to heaven. He became deranged about three years before his death, and continued in that state until a short time before his departure from time, when he became conscious, and in an audible voice praised the Lord.

In Westerly, R. I., March 18th, Esther Vernelia, wife of Charles A. Stillman, aged 24 years and 8 months. In her early youth she made a public profession of her faith in Christ as her Saviour, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Scott, N. Y. On the 6th of June, 1845, she became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Pawcatuck, which relation she sustained to the time of her death. Her piety was of an unostentatious character, yet manifested itself in those forms which gave to those who knew her best a firm assurance that the principles of Christianity were deep-rooted in her heart. Having for a number of months previous to her death felt, and frequently expressed to her friends, a premonition that she should stay but a very short time with them, she manifested a diligence quite unusual to set her house in order for the approach of death. When it came, she met it with Christian resignation, and as we hope fell asleep in Jesus. A. B. B.

In Hopkinton, R. I., March 16th, of bilious colic, Mr. George W. Holdridge, aged 53 years. In the death of Mr. H., community has sustained a great loss. He had served his State as Representative and Senator in different sessions of the Legislature, besides the aid he had rendered his own town in several positions of trust. He was ever alive to the wants of society and the good of his fellow men. He was a professor of religion, and under its divine influence he was enabled to meet death without fear, being sustained by the approving presence of Him who is "the resurrection and the life." C. M. L.

Near Marlboro, N. J., March 19th, of inflammation of the lungs and typhoid fever, Auley Ayars, in the sixty-third year of his age. Bro. A. professed religion in early life, and united with the Church in Marlboro. He afterwards removed to Scott, N. Y., and became a member of that church. After a stay there of about twelve years, he with his family returned to Marlboro, and attended worship, but did not offer his letter, or apply for membership. His illness was short, but severe, and he bore it with patience. On being asked if he enjoyed a hope of acceptance with God, he replied, that for a number of months he had felt a strong assurance of that. Funeral on the 20th; sermon from the 13th chapter of Hosea, first part of the 14th verse—"I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death."

At Bridgeton, N. J., March 20th, of inflammation of the lungs, Charles Francis, infant son of John and Hannah Ann Richerson.

At Columbia, March 22d, Sarah, wife of Zebediah Davis. Sister Davis had long been a member of the church, had been much afflicted, and bore her affliction with Christian patience. Sermon from Psalm 73: 26.

At Carltown, N. J., March 23d, suddenly, Dea. John Robbins, in the 81st year of his age. He had long been an exemplary member of the church, and died in hope of a blessed immortality. Funeral on the 24th, at the Marlboro meeting-house; sermon from the text, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." D. C.

In Lisbon, Ct., March 18, 1853, James Stetson, aged 73 years. Mr. Stetson was a member of the First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I. Although he lived at a distance from any of our societies, he was a very strict Sabbath-keeper. His life and conversation had been exemplary, and his death was peaceful and happy. He leaves a large family of children to mourn his departure.

In Verona, N. Y., March 10th, of inflammation of the lungs, Emily Louisa, daughter of Charles and Belinda Williams, aged 1 year and 3 months.

In Oriskany, N. Y., March 17th, of croup, Mary Sophia, daughter of Doct. Zaccheus R. and Laura Babcock, aged 2 years, 4 months, and 3 days. C. C.

In Milton, Wis., Dec. 12, 1852, Florence Eugene Sweet, aged two years and six months.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses; Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

"THE AMERICAN SLAVE CODE, IN THEORY AND PRACTICE: Its distinctive features shown by its Statutes, Judicial Decisions, and Illustrative Facts." By William Goodell, author of the "Democracy of Christianity," "Slavery and Anti-Slavery," &c. New York: American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 48 Beekman street. The work contains 430 pages 12mo, neatly bound in cloth, and will be sold for cash at 75 cents single copy, $6 per dozen, and $45 per hundred. Also, in paper covers, at a deduction of 10 cents per copy from the above prices.

Orders may be forwarded to Lewis Tappan, 48 Beekman street, New York.

Extract of a Letter from Hon. Wm. Jay to the Author.

"Your analysis of the slave laws is very able, and your exhibition of their practical application by the Southern Courts, evinces great and careful research." "Your book is as impregnable against the charge of exaggeration as Euclid's Geometry, since, like that, it consists of propositions and demonstrations. The book is not only true, but it is unquestionably true."

Miscellaneous.

Nebraska Territory.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The Western Emigrant Society held a meeting March 6th, pursuant to their former appointment, at which it was decided that the proposed Territory of Nebraska offers the greatest inducement for a new Sabbath-keeping Colony of any portion of the Great West with which we are acquainted; but as it is not yet opened for legal settlement, it was agreed to postpone any farther action upon the subject until we learn finally what disposition Congress makes of the Bill now pending upon that matter.

Friends of the object desirous of corresponding, are requested to address their communications to "the Western Emigrant Society of Sabbath-keepers, care of David Bishop & Dennis Ayers, Committee, Farmington, Ill."

The publication of the following Letter of Wm. Guthrie would be received as a favor.

Nebraska Territory.

To the Editor of the Washington Union:—

Sir: The numerous letters of inquiry I have received from various sections of the country in relation to the resources, &c., of Nebraska Territory, induce me to request a small space in your paper to answer the inquiries of my correspondents. I do this for the purpose of saving myself the trouble of writing the same thing over again and again, and to disseminate the information even more widely than a private correspondence could do.

The boundaries of Nebraska Territory have not been defined by law, but those which the nature and condition of the country reasonably require, and which will probably be established by Congress, are: on the East by the State of Missouri, on the west by the summit of the Rocky Mountains, on the south by the thirty-sixth degree and thirty minutes of north latitude, and on the north by the forty-third degree of north latitude. These boundaries, though extensive, will be necessary to the protection of the settlements which will soon spread over the Territory, and of the thousands of emigrants that pass through it from various points, until the new State be formed, and a government be established for the residue of the Territory.

The inquiries addressed to me are mainly respecting the soil, climate, productions, water, minerals, and facilities of trade.

1st. Soil.—The soil is a rich black loam, varying in depth from one foot to five feet. This description of soil extends (with very slight exceptions) from the eastern boundary of the Territory for a distance of about two hundred miles westward, and for that distance will support as dense a population as any other part of the world of equal extent. Indeed, I doubt whether there is another region of country so large that will equal it in beauty or fertility of soil. I have seen much of old Mexico, New Mexico, California, and other parts of the United States, and I have not yet seen it equaled in these particulars. Its only objectionable feature is a scarcity of timber on the high rolling prairies. Along the streams, however, the timber is generally equal to the wants of the farmer, and consists of oak, walnut, hickory, ash, pecan, cottonwood, hackberry, cherry, &c. Westward of these two hundred miles the land generally becomes less desirable, yet the whole country, up to the mountains, abounds in charming valleys, where industry will obtain a fair reward for its labors. Indeed, I am not sure that this will not be as valuable as any other portion of the country, if the settler would turn his attention to wool-growing; for the short, nutritious buffalo grass, which covers these elevated regions, and the dry, undulating surface of the country, peculiarly adapt it to the raising of sheep.

2d. Climate.—This is changeable, but less so than in the western, middle, and eastern States. The winters are usually cold and dry, setting in about the first of December, and lasting till about the middle of February. During the latter part of February and the months of March and April, there is but little rain, affording the farmer the finest opportunity to put his grounds and fences in order for the planting season. A month of very wet weather usually succeeds, but sometimes the rains do not set in till June. The summers are long and warm, but relieved by copious and seasonable rains. There is seldom any frost between the first of May and the first of October, and though the weather is extremely warm during this time, it is without that debilitating sultriness which is so common in the middle States. There is a never-ceasing breeze from the snows of the Rocky Mountains, which sweeps over the vast region, carrying with it health and vigor to the whole animal creation.

3d. The productions are hemp, tobacco, corn, wheat, rye, oats, buckwheat, and every variety of vegetable that is grown in the same latitudes in other parts of the United States, and these attain to a higher degree of perfection than I have elsewhere seen, except in California, where, I think, the finest potatoes are produced which the world affords. Corn and wheat yield as abundant crops as in any part of the United States, and of a quality nowhere surpassed.

4th. Water.—The eastern portion of the Territory abounds in springs and small streams of the purest water. I cannot say from personal observation whether the western portion possesses this advantage in as high a degree or not, but understand from those who have traveled over it, that there is no scarcity of water in any part of it. The Missouri river forms the northeastern boundary of the Territory, and is navigable for first-class steamboats the year round, except about two and a half months of winter. The Kansas river, running from a south-westerly direction, flows into the Missouri at the State line. It is about two hundred miles long, and is believed to be navigable for second-class steamboats for that distance. The valley of the Kansas is the finest portion of the Territory, and is watered by numerous streams, which afford good power for manufacturing purposes.

5th. Minerals.—Bituminus coal has been discovered in many parts of the country, and will doubtless be found in the greatest abundance when the country shall be thrown open to examination and settlement.

At present the military commandants, stationed in the Territory to protect the inhabitants, assume to be the rulers of the country, and have, by proclamation, forbidden researches of this kind. I do not believe there is such another instance of the wanton exercise of arbitrary power in our whole history. Even in despotic governments, the subjects in time of peace are permitted to go whither they please, and ascertain as far as they may the relative advantages of different sections of the empire.

Besides coal, it is believed that tin, gold, and iron ore, have been found on the head-waters of the Kansas, but whether they exist there in any considerable quantities is uncertain. Limestone, or sandstone, are everywhere abundant.

6th. Facilities of Trade.—The Missouri river, which forms the northeastern boundary of the Territory for a distance of three hundred miles, is navigable for steamboats of the larger class, and these ply daily from St. Louis as far up as the business will justify. At present St. Joseph, which is about one hundred miles above the mouth of the Kansas, is the highest point to which they make regular trips.

The Kansas, too, will probably afford the means of transportation to and from the interior of the country. There having been no business to justify it, steamboats have not yet tried the navigation of this river. Yet there can be but little doubt of its being navigable for steamboats of the smaller size for a distance of about two hundred miles.

Besides these advantages, there are two railroads now under contract, and in progress of construction, from the Mississippi river to the eastern boundary of Nebraska. One of these roads starts at Hannibal and terminates at St. Joseph, on the Missouri river, a distance of about two hundred miles; the other starts at St. Louis, and ends at the mouth of Kansas river, a distance of two hundred and ninety miles. These roads will unite with the great central trunk which is designed to connect the Pacific with the Atlantic States.

This stupendous work is now engaging the attention of our ablest statesmen, and a great many projects are being presented to the public for consideration. It is, doubtless, the most magnificent design that ever entered the conception of the human mind, whether we consider the magnitude of the work itself, or the incalculable benefits it will confer upon the country.

There being no organized government for Nebraska, no lands have yet been surveyed; nor is there even a judicial tribunal in the country. But there is now a bill before Congress for the establishment of a territorial government, which, it is to be hoped, will be favorably considered, and acted upon at an early day. But as no pioneers have ever yet been driven from the public domain upon which they have sought a home under a democratic administration, so it is presumable that the same liberal policy will be pursued by that to be installed on the 4th of March.

Indeed, the settlement of the country ever was of greater importance in a national and in a philanthropic point of view than this. There do not less than fifty thousand emigrants pass through this Territory annually on their way to California, Utah, Oregon, and New Mexico. Yet this vast multitude, upon leaving the comfortable steamboats, start upon their long and perilous journey, totally unacquanited with, and incredulous of, the dangers that surround them. The novelty of their situation exhilarates and impels them rather to seek than to shun exposure. Thus diseases are superinduced, and there being no human habitation by the wayside, where the sick may find repose and a good Samaritan to administer to his wants, he is forced along; for the length of the journey and the danger of delay compel the emigrant to press forward with ceaseless diligence, until the harassed invalid, worn out by fatigue, and weakened by disease, is hurried to the grave.

I have no hesitation in saying, that I believe a thousand valuable lives would every year be saved, if this country were thrown open to settlement, and placed under territorial jurisdiction, so that settlements could be extended along the great thoroughfares; for thus the emigrant could become inured to the hardships of his journey before leaving the abodes of civilization. A conclusive evidence of this is the fact that nearly all the deaths between Missouri and California, occur within the first three hundred miles.

A considerable portion of the eastern part of the Territory belongs to Indian tribes who are settled upon it, and are a harmless, hospitable people. As they cultivate but a small part of their lands, and derive no benefit from the residue, they wish to sell it and invest the money in such a way as to afford them a permanent income. For example, there are the Delawares, who own twenty-two hundred thousand acres, and yet do not cultivate one thousand. The balance is useless to the Indians, and an insuperable obstacle to the settlement and prosperity of the country. It is to be hoped that Congress will at its present session make an appropriation to enable the President to treat with these Indians on terms advantageous to them and to the country.

I have now briefly answered, I believe, all the inquiries adddressed to me. It may not be improper to state that, not yet having been admitted to a seat in the House of Representatives, I do not possess the franking privilege. However, I shall not neglect any letters of inquiry addressed to me because the writers have been mistaken in supposing I would receive them free of postage. A. Guthrie.

January 8, 1853.

The New Rochelle Blackberry.

The Secretary reminded the Chair that Mr. Lawton, of New Rochelle, Westchester Co., was present, and that he was the gentleman who exhibited the remarkable stalk of a blackberry, which was then on the the table, whereupon the Chair requested Mr. Lawton to give the Club some information regarding this remarkable new variety of fruit.

Mr. Lawton stated that one of his neighbors discovered, some six or eight years ago, a bunch of blackberry vines by the side of the road, of different quality from the common high blackberries, and so much superior that he was induced to transfer them to his garden. From this small beginning they have been propagated as much as possible. Mr. Lawton first obtained them in 1848; it is his intention to set ten acres as soon as he can get the plants. He stated that the stalk exhibited had been headed back, so that it resembled a bush about four and a half feet high, with a spreading head, which he presumed, from his knowledge of the general yield, had borne a gallon of fruit.

The character of these berries is very unlike the fruit of the common high blackberry vines, which is long and full of seeds, while the new variety is nearly round, very pulpy, the pips being large, in which the seed are entirely hid from view. He stated that he had measured many berries that were three inches round; that the general size and shape were as near like Hovey's seedling strawberries as any thing he could compare them to. The flavor of the fruit is sweet and rich, to a remarkable degree, and vines long bearing. His first crop ripened July 28th, and continued till the second week of September. The next, August 4th, and continued four weeks. Last summer, owing to the great drought, they only continued about three weeks in full bearing. The vines grow almost equally well in shade as in open ground; and if an opportunity is given, will climb twenty feet into a tree.

Mr. Lawton sold his berries last summer to a New York dealer for ten cents a basket—equal to about twenty-five cents a quart—the buyer picking them himself. It is the opinion of Mr. Lawton, that this is an entirely new variety of the blackberry; and besides the greater value of the fruit, they bear garden culture much better than the other, or common variety. The demand for new plants is greater than can be supplied at present at moderate rates—the price now is fifty cents.

The Strength of Insects.

In a volume published by Van Voorst, on "The Natural History of Animals," several illustrations are given of the super-herculean strength with which the commonest insects are endowed. The common flea, as every one knows, will, without much apparent effort, jump two hundred times its own length, and several grasshoppers and locusts are said to be able to perform leaps quite as wonderful. In the case of the insects they scarcely excite our notice; but if a man were coolly to take a standing leap of three hundred and eighty odd yards, which would be an equivalent exertion of muscular power, perhaps our admirers of athletic sports might be rather startled at such a performance. Again, for a man to run ten miles within the hour would be admitted to be a tolerably good display of pedestrianism; but what are we to say to the little fly observed by Mr. Delisle, "so minute as almost to be invisible," which ran nearly six inches in a second, and in that space was calculated to have made one thousand and eighty steps? This, according to the calculation of Kirby and Spence, is as if a man whose steps measured only two feet, should run at the incredible rate of twenty miles in a minute.

Equally surprising are the instances of insect strength given by Mr. Newport. The great stag-beetle, which tears off the bark from the roots and the branches of trees, has been known to gnaw a hole, an inch in diameter, through the side of an iron canister in which it was confined, and on which the marks of its jaws were distinctly visible. The common beetle can, without injury, support and even raise very great weights, and make its way beneath almost any amount of pressure. In order to put the strength of this insect-Atlas to the test, experiments have been made which prove that it is able to sustain and escape from beneath a load of from twenty to thirty ounces, a prodigious burden when it is remembered that the insect itself does not weigh as many grains; in fact, once more taking man as a standard of comparison, it is as though a person of ordinary size should raise and get from under a weight of between forty and fifty tons.

Fire Departments of London and Paris.

In Philadelphia, where they continue to agitate the question of establishing a "Paid Fire Department," the committee appointed some time since to report, gave the following account of the way fires are managed in London and Paris:—

"In London, the department is under the control of the public authorities, and the apparatus is public property. The engines are so arranged as to be also hose carriages, and are drawn by two fleet horses, and manned by four men each, who ride to the fire on seats prepared on the carriages. The whole department is under the direction of a chief superintendent, to whom all the men are responsible, and who is responsible to the public authorities. Upon arriving at a fire, means are at once taken to prevent the interference of a crowd, and if assistance is required to aid the department, it is obtained from those near, according to the necessity of the case, and paid for at the rate of a shilling sterling an hour. The whole is conducted with great promptitude, and managed with decision and energy, without noise, without confusion, without disorder, and without any unnecessary interference with the pursuits of the people, who feel that the business is in safe and efficient hands. There, accordingly, fires are not got up for amusement, as the firemen prefer their quiet quarters to any such recreation, and have yet to find out that there is pleasure in breaking each other's heads. The engine house is their station, where the horses are ready harnessed, and with a man always on guard, so that they are prepared at all times to hasten off to the scene of danger. And as these stations are in different parts of the city, with a good system of signals, they act with great celerity and effect. The firemen have also the powers of a constable, to enable them to make arrests and preserve order. As a consequence of all this, London is but little afflicted with fires, and the rate of premium for insurance is very low, being only about eight cents on the hundred dollars.

"In Paris the system is quite different from any yet referred to. The firemen there are called 'Sappeurs Pompiers,' and, as their name indicates, they are sappers or workmen, as well as pumpers. Their reliance, indeed, is almost entirely upon their activity as workmen, and water is but little and rarely used to extinguish fires. As in London, they have stations in different parts of the city, and the men are there prepared with their equipments for work. These consist mainly of an axe, iron grapplers, and a rope to coil around their body with a hook to the end of it. When a fire occurs in the upper part of a building, they will with great dexterity throw the hook through the window and secure it to the sill or the sash, and then run up, hand over hand, and fall to work with the axe to knock away all that is combustible, and to throw it out of the window, either with their hands or their grapplers. They are always in readiness for duty, and proceed to it with alacrity, and with little noise or confusion. They are also stationed in the evenings at the theatres, and wherever they may suppose there is more than common danger. As a consequence of their efficiency, the destruction of property by fire or water is exceedingly small, and though the houses are generally wainscoted with wooden floors, and wooden stairs, the rate of premium for insurance there is lower than in any part of Europe, being about two cents on the hundred dollars. As a proof that this is the cause, it may be remarked that in Lyons, though the houses have stone stairs, and are therefore less combustible, yet, as the department is not as efficient as in Paris, the rate of insurance is double, and in Marseilles, though the floors are of tile and the stairs are of stone, the insurance, for a similar reason, is four times as high as in Lyons."

The U. S. Navy.

According to the Navy Register for the current year, the following is the naval force of the United States:—

Eleven ships of the line, carrying eight hundred and sixty guns. Of these, three are in commission as receiving ships, three in ordinary, four on the stocks, and one preparing for sea. The Independence, a razee, carrying fifty-four guns, is also preparing for sea.

Twelve frigates of the first and one of the second class, carrying five hundred and sixty-four guns. Of these, five are in commission, four in ordinary, two on the stocks, and two preparing for sea.

Twenty-one sloops of war, carrying four hundred and two guns. Of these, fifteen are in commission, one in ordinary, and one preparing for sea.

Four brigs, carrying forty guns. Of these, three are in commission and one preparing for sea. Also, four schooners, carrying seven guns, two of which are in commission, one in ordinary, and one preparing for sea.

Five steam-frigates, carrying forty guns, all in commission; four steamers of the first class, carrying eighteen guns, two of which are in commission, one repairing, and one preparing for sea; and seven steamers less than first class, carrying five guns, three of which are in commission, two preparing for sea, and two employed as tenders.

Five store-ships, carrying twenty-four guns; three of them are in commission, and one preparing for sea.

This gives a total of seventy-five vessels of all kinds, carrying two thousand and fourteen guns.

Poultry Raising.

At a recent meeting of the Concord Farmers' Club, the question being, "Is the raising of poultry profitable?" Mr. James P. Brown said he had entertained the opinion that the raising of poultry could not be made profitable among the farmers in Middlesex county. His sons, however, having a different opinion, a year ago he proposed to sell them all his poultry, and purchase of them what eggs and chickens he wanted for the family, upon the condition that they were to keep an accurate account of expenses, and make a true return to him at the end of the year.

Before coming in to the meeting he called upon them for a return up to this time, the period including nine months, and the following is their statement:—

Had on hand March 1, 1852, 26 fowls, valued at	$10 00
Cost of keeping, consisting of corn meal, potatoes and meat	19 65	$29 65
Received for 33 pairs chickens sold	28 13
For eggs up to Dec. 1	19 31
Have 82 fowls worth 22 cents each	27 38	74 67
Profit in nine months		$45 02

He had seen from day to-day how the fowls had been taken care of, and after reading this statement, had changed his opinion, and now believes that poultry may be profitably raised in Middlesex county, by bestowing upon it the same attention that is given to other farm stock when well taken care of. These fowls were plentifully supplied with such food as is accessible to all who usually keep them—corn, oats, meal, potatoes, and occasionally fresh meat, such as the plucks of sheep, or the flesh of young calves, many of which are killed when three or four days old by those who are selling milk. Improvements in Papier-Mache.

Charles Bilefield, a paper-mache manufacturer of London, has invented some very great and important improvements in the making of different kinds of articles out of papier-mache. He makes the substance, not out of paper, as has been heretofore practiced, but out of cotton rags, the substance of which paper is made. Picture frames having the appearance of the finest carved work, and resembling oak, mahogany, maple, bronze, &c., likewise panels, partitions, pillars, grate slabs, resembling the finest marble, are made out of old rags. These preparations are water-proof, and sound-proof, and they will stand any climate without cracking or warping. They can be cut, filed, sawed, planed, turned on a lathe, nailed, screwed, and are bad conductors of heat; therefore, they are excellent for both hot and cold climates. He has lately had the fitting up of the interior of a new steamboat for the Pasha of Egypt, wood and other ornamented work not being able to stand the dry climate of that country. It is the intention of the inventor to make slabs of his material for the walls of houses, as a substitute for stone and iron. The blocks can all be molded to fit into one another, so that they can be carried to any distance, and then fitted up with screws.

Punctuality—Method.

I do not mean the merely being in time for lectures, dinners, etc., but mean that spirit out of which punctuality grows—that love of accuracy, precision, and vigor, which makes efficient men and women—the determination that what you have to do shall be done in spite of all petty obstacles, and finished off at once, and finally. I believe I have told you the story of Nelson and his coachmaker, but you must hear it again. When he was on the point of departure for one of his great expeditions, the coachmaker said to him, "The carriage shall be at the door punctually at six o'clock." "A quarter before," said Nelson, "I have always been a quarter of an hour before my time, and it has made a man of me."

The punctuality which I desire for you, involves and comprehends an exact arrangement of your time. It is a matter on which much depends. Fix how much time you must spend on each object, and keep all but obstinately to your plan.

"Method," says Cecil, "is like packing things in a box—a good packer will get in half as much again as a bad one."

Burning Fluid and Camphene.—A Boston correspondent requests us to explain the difference (for the benefit of many) between camphene and the spirit gas (explosive fluid) sold in our stores, as many people suppose camphene to be explosive, and do not know the difference between it and the spirit gas. Camphene is highly rectified spirits of turpentine, contains no alcohol, and is not explosive. It will not burn in a common lamp without a chimney, as it contains C. 10, H. 8—a very large quantity of carbon, and emits much smoke, which is only prevented by using a long chimney to supply a great quantity of oxygen to support combustion. The spirit gas is a mixture of rectified camphene with about five or six times its quantity, by measure, of alcohol. They are mixed together in a cold state. It is the volatile nature of the alcohol which is the cause of danger.

Curious Circumstance.—A few day since, a gentleman in the vicinity of Boston, observed that the tassel to the shade of his chamber window was badly burned, and in a manner which gave no indication of the cause. He failed in his inquiries, and no person in the house could give him any information. A morning or two after, the domestic, who was attending to the room, ran down in haste, exclaiming that the chamber window was on fire. An examination explained the mystery. In front of the window, which looked easterly, stood a shaving glass affixed to a moveable stand. A magnifying glass on the back reflected the rays of the sun, bringing them to a focus on the window, and whenever they struck on wood they burned into it, charring the frame in many places. A piece of paper placed against the window was set on fire, and indeed, the heat was so intense that it instantly burned whatever it touched. When first discovered, the frame of the window was blazing. Had the fire extended, it is not probable that the origin of it would have been discovered, and it would have been placed among those incomprehensible causes which can find no other solution than willful mischief.

Permeability of Metals by Mercury.—J. Nickles, in experiments on the metals, has discovered that those which will form an amalgam with mercury are easily permeated by it. Horsford and others establish the permeability of tin, lead, gold, silver, zinc, and cadmium, to which M. J. Nickles adds copper and brass. This fact was discovered by accident—he was using a Bunsen's battery; the connecting pieces of copper were riveted to the zinc, and on amalgamating the latter metal, it often happened that the mercury spread itself over the copper, and after a certain time this latter metal became brittle, having a white fracture, proving itself an amalgam. With a stylet, he then traced a furrow on plates to be experimented on, and placed a little mercury therein. In order to hasten the amalgamation, a drop of bi-chloride of mercury, acidified with hydro-chloric acid, is introduced. By this means the amalgamation takes place instantly, and the surface is fitted to retain at once the quantity of mercury necessary to produce the effect. [London Miner's Journal.

Singular Geological Fact.—At Modena, in Italy, within a circle of four miles around the city, whenever the earth is dug, and the workmen arrive at the distance of sixty-three feet, they come to a bed of chalk, which they bore with an auger, five feet deep. They then withdraw from the pit before the auger is removed, and upon its refraction the water bursts up with great violence, and quickly fills the well thus made, the supply of water being neither affected by rains or droughts. At the depth of fourteen feet are found the ruins of an ancient city, houses, paved streets, and masonic work. Below this again is a layer of earth, and at twenty-six feet walnut trees are found entire, with leaves and walnuts upon them. At twenty-eight feet soft chalk is found, and below this vegetables and trees.

David Crockett.—An anecdote is related of this remarkable man, which does him infinitely more honor than any office he ever held. Before he was a candidate for Congress, or ever expected to be, there was a season of scarcity in the Western District, where he lived. He went up the Mississippi, and bought a flat-boat load of corn, and took it to what he called "his old stumping ground." When a man came to him to buy corn, the first question he asked, was:—"Have you got the money to pay for it?" If the answer was in the affirmative, Davy's reply was, "Then you can't have a kernel. I brought it here to sell to people that have no money." It was the foundation of his popularity.

A Self-Winding Clock.—After many years of mathematical labor, and mechanical results, Prof. Willis of Rochester has completed and has now in constant operation a self-winding clock, which determines the seconds, minutes, hours, days, weeks, months, and years of time, with unfailing accuracy, continuing in constant motion, by itself, never requiring to be wound up, never running down, but moving perpetually so long as its component parts exist. It might easily be called a perpetual motion, and it is so in one sense, but the inventor properly makes no such claim.

Vinegar from Beets.—It is said that good vinegar can be made from beets. The juice of one bushel of sugar beets, worth twenty-five cents, and which farmers can raise without cost, will make them five or six gallons of vinegar, equal to the best made of cider or wine. Grate the beets, having first washed them, and express the juice in a cheese-press, or in any way which a little ingenuity can suggest, and put the liquor into an empty barrel; cover the bung hole with guaze, and set in the sun, and in twelve or sixteen days it will be ready for use.

Rancid Butter.—A French scientific journal states that the bad smell and taste of butter may be entirely removed by working it over in water mixed with chloride of lime. The discovery was made by a Brussels farmer, whose practice is to take a sufficient quantity of pure cold water to work it in, and put in it from 25 to 30 drops of chloride of lime for every ten pounds of butter. When it has been worked until the whole has been brought into contact with the water, it should be worked again in pure water, when it will be found to be as sweet as when originally made.

The steamer Fashion is now running on lake Erie, between Detroit and Toledo. The steamer Admiral is running on Lake Ontario, between Rochester and Toronto.

Mr. Jones, the Secretary of the Vice President elect, says that Mr. King spends the greater part of the day in a sugar house, and he now entertains hopes of his recovery.

American Sabbath Tract Society's Publications.

The American Sabbath Tract Society publishes the following tracts, which are for sale at its Depository, No. 9 Spruce-st., N. Y., viz:—

No. 1—Reasons for introducing the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment to the consideration of the Christian Public. 28 pp.
No. 2—Moral Nature and Scriptural Observance of the Sabbath. 52 pp.
No. 3—Authority for the Change of the Day of the Sabbath. 28 pp.
No. 4—The Sabbath and Lord's Day: A History of their Observance in the Christian Church. 52 pp.
No. 5—A Christian Caveat to the Old and New Sabbatarians. 4 pp.
No. 6—Twenty Reasons for keeping holy, in each week, the Seventh Day instead of the First Day. 4 pp.
No. 7—Thirty-six Plain Questions presenting the main points in the Controversy; A Dialogue between a Minister of the Gospel and a Sabbatarian; Counterfeit Coin. 8 pp.
No. 8—The Sabbath Controversy: The True Issue 4 pp.
No. 9—The Fourth Commandment: False Exposition 4 pp.
No. 10—The True Sabbath Embraced and Observed. 16 pp.
No. 11—Religious Liberty Endangered by Legislative Enactments. 16 pp.
No. 12—Misuse of the Term Sabbath. 8 pp.
No. 13—The Bible Sabbath. 24 pp.
No. 14—Delaying Obedience. 4 pp.
No. 15—An Appeal for the Restoration of the Bible Sabbath, in an Address to the Baptists, from the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference. 40 pp.

The Society has also published the following works to which attention is invited:—

A Defense of the Sabbath, in reply to Ward on the Fourth Commandment. By George Carlow. First printed in London, in 1724; reprinted at Stonington, Ct., in 1802; now republished in a revised form. 168 pp.
The Royal Law Contended for. By Edward Stennet First printed in London, in 1658. 60 pp.
Vindication of the True Sabbath, by J. W. Morton, late Missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. 64 pp.
Also, a periodical sheet, quarto, The Sabbath Vindicator. Price $1 00 per hundred.

The series of fifteen tracts, together with Edward Stennett's "Royal Law Contended for," and J. W. Morton's "Vindication of the True Sabbath," may be had in a bound volume. Price 50 cents.

These tracts will be furnished to those wishing them for distribution or sale, at the rate of 15 pages for one cent. Persons desiring them can have them forwarded by mail or otherwise, on sending their address, with a remittance, to George B. Utter, Corresponding Secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Soc.'s Publications.

The Sabbath Recorder,

Published Weekly.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in Advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

The Sabbath-School Visitor,

Published Monthly.

Terms per Annum—Invariably in advance:

One copy	$ 25
Five copies to one address	1 00
Twelve copies to one address	2 00
Twenty copies to one address	3 00
Twenty-eight copies to one address	4 00
Forty copies to one address	5 00

The Seventh-day Baptist Memorial,

Published Quarterly.

Terms—$1 00 a Year, 25 Cents a Number.

Each number of the Memorial will contain a lithographic portrait of a Seventh-day Baptist preacher, together with a variety of historical, biographical, and statistical matter, designed to illustrate the rise, progress, and present condition of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Wood-cuts of meeting-houses will be introduced from time to time in connection with the history of the churches.

☞ Orders and remittances for the above should be addressed to the General Agent, George B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York

Postage.

THE HUSBAND'S PRESENT.

BY A JOURNEYMAN PRINTER.

It was a bitter cold night on the 24th of December. The snow lay upon the frozen earth, and the bright moon, riding half way up the heavens, lent a crystaline luster to the scene. In the high road, a short distance from a quiet reposing village, stood the form of a human being. His garments were scant and tattered—by far insufficient to keep out the biting frost; his frame shook and trembled like the ice-bound boughs of the weeping willow that grew near him; and his face, as the moonbeams danced upon it, exhibited all the fearful footprints of the demon—Intemperance. Poor, wretched, and debased, he looked—and such, in truth, he was.

Before him, at the end of a neatly fenced and trellised inclosure, stood a small cottage. It was elegant in its simple neatness, and just such a one as the humble lover of true comfort and joy would seek for a home. The tears rolled down the bloated cheeks of the poor inebriate as he gazed upon the cottage, and at length, as he clasped his hands in agony, he murmured—

"O, thou fond home of my happier days, thou lookest like a heaven of the past. Beneath thy roof I was married to the idol of my soul, and within thy peaceful walls God gave me two blessed children. There peace and plenty were mine, and love and joy were mine. My wife—God bless her gentle soul—was happy then, and my children—may Heaven protect them—laughed and played in gleesome pleasure. Gladnesss played upon us then, and every hour was a season of bliss. But I lost them as a fool loseth his own salvation! Six years have passed since the demon that I took to my heart drove us from your sheltering roof. And those six years! Oh, what misery, what anguish, what sorrows, and what degradation, have they not brought to me and my poor family! Home, health, wealth, peace, joy, and friends, are all gone—all, all gone! Oh, thou fatal cup—no, I will not blame thee—it was I—I who did it! Year after year, I tampered with thy deadly sting, when I knew that destruction lurked in thy smile. But, but," and the poor man raised his eyes to heaven as he spoke, "there is room on earth for another man—and I will be that man!"

Within the only apartment of a miserable and almost broken-down hovel, sat a woman and two children—a boy and a girl. The cold wind found its entrance through a hundred crevices, and as its biting gusts swept through the room, the mother and children crouched nearer to the few embers that still smouldered upon the hearth. The only furniture was four poor stools, a rickety table, and a scantily covered bed; while in one corner, nearest to the fire-place, was a heap of straw and tattered blankets, which served as a resting place for the brother and sister. Part of a tallow candle was burning upon the table, and by its dim light one might have seen that wretched mother's countenance. It was pale, and wan, and wet with tears. The faces of her children were both buried in her lap, and they seemed to sleep peacefully under her prayerful guardianship.

At length the sound of footsteps upon the snow crust struck upon the mother's ears, and hastily arousing her children, she hurried them to their lowly bed, and hardly had they crouched away beneath the thin blankets, when the door was opened, and the man whom we have already seen before the pretty cottage, entered the place. With a trembling and fearful look, the wife gazed up into her husband's face, and seemed ready to crouch back from his approach, when the mark of a tear-drop upon his cheek caught her eye. Could it be, thought she, that that pearly drop was in truth a tear! No; perhaps a snow-flake had fallen there and melted.

Once or twice Thomas Wilkins seemed upon the point of speaking some word to his wife, but at length he turned slowly away, and silently undressed himself, and very soon after his weary limbs had touched the bed, he was asleep.

Long and earnestly did Mrs. Wilkins gaze upon the features of her husband after he had fallen asleep. There was something strange in his manner; something unaccountable; surely he had not been drinking, for his countenance had none of that vacant, wild, demoniac look, that usually rested there. His features were rather sad and thoughtful than otherwise; and, O heavens, is it possible? a smile played about his mouth, and a sound, as if of prayer, issued from his lips while yet he slept!

A faint hope, like the misty vapor of approaching morn, flitted before the heart-broken wife. But she could not grasp it; she had no foundation for it; and with a deep groan she let the phantom pass. She went to her children, and drew the clothes more closely about them; she then knelt by their side, and after imprinting on their cheeks a mother's kiss, uttered a fervent prayer in their behalf, and sought the repose of the pillow.

Long ere the morning dawned, Thomas Wilkins arose from his bed, dressed himself, and left the house. His poor wife awoke just as he was going out, and she would have called to him, but she dared not. She would have told him that she had no fuel, no bread—not anything with which to warm and feed the children; but he was gone, and she sank back upon her pillow and wept.

The light of morning came at last, but Mrs. Wilkins had not risen from out her resting-place. A sound of footsteps was heard from without, accompanied by a noise, as though a light sled were being dragged through the snow. The door opened, and the husband entered. He laid upon the table a heavy wheaten loaf, a small pail, and a paper bundle; then from his pocket he took another paper parcel, and again he turned toward the door. When next he entered, he bore in his arms a load of wood; and three times did he go out and return with a load of the same description. Then he bent over the fire-place, and soon a blazing fire snapped on the hearth. As soon as this was accomplished, Thomas Wilkins bent over his children, and kissed them; then he went to the bedside of his wife, and while some powerful emotion stirred in his soul and made his chest heave, he murmured:

"Kiss me, Lizzie."

Tightly that wife wound her arms about the neck of her husband, and as though the love of years had centered in that one kiss, she pressed it upon his lips.

"There—no more," he uttered, as he gently laid the arm of his wife from his neck; "these things I have brought are for you and our children;" and as he spoke he left the house.

Mrs. Wilkins arose from her bed, and tremblingly she examined the articles on the table. She found the loaf, and in the pail she found milk; one of the papers contained two smaller bundles—one of tea and one of sugar—while in the remaining parcel she found a nice lump of butter.

"O," murmured the poor wife and mother, as she gazed upon the food before her, "whence came these? Can it be that Thomas has stolen them? No, he never did that! And then that look—that kiss—those words! O, my poor, poor heart, raise not a hope that may only fail and crush thee!"

"Mother," at this moment spoke her son, who had raised himself upon his elbow, "is father gone?"

"Yes, Charley."

"O tell me, mother, did he not come and kiss me and little Abby this morning?"

"Yes, yes—he did!" cried the mother, as she flew to the side of her boy, and wound her arms about him.

"And, mother, said the child, in low, trembling accents, while he turned a tearful look to his parent's face, "will not father be good to us once more?"

That mother could not speak, she could only press her children more fondly to her bosom, and weep a mother's tears upon them.

Was Lizzie Wilkins happy as she sat her children down to that morning's meal? At least, a ray of sunshine was struggling to gain entrance to her bosom.

Toward the middle of the afternoon, Mr. Abel Walker, a retired sea captain of some wealth, sat in his comfortable parlor, engaged in reading, when one of his servants informed him that some one at the door wished to see him.

"Tell him to come in," returned Walker.

"But it's that miserable Wilkins, sir."

"Never mind," said the captain, after a moment's hesitation, "show him in." "Poor fellow," he continued, after the servant had gone, "I wonder what he wants. In truth, I pity him."

With a trembling step and downcast look, Thomas Wilkins entered Captain Walker's parlor.

"Ah, Wilkins," said the old captain, "what has brought you here?"

The poor man twice attempted to speak, but his heart failed him.

"Do you come for charity?"

"No, sir," quickly returned Wilkins, while his eyes gleamed with a proud light.

"Then sit down and out with it," said Walker, in a blunt, but kind tone.

"Captain Walker, commenced the poor man, as he took the proffered seat, "I have come to ask you if you still own that little cottage beyond the hill?"

"I do."

"And is it occupied?"

"No."

"Is it engaged?"

"No," returned the captain, regarding his visitor with uncommon interest; "but why do you ask?"

"Captain Walker," said Wilkins, in a firm and manly tone, even though his eyes glistened and his lips quivered, "I have been poor and degraded, deeply steeped in the dregs of poverty and disgrace. Everything that made life valuable, I have almost lost. My wife and children have suffered; and God only knows how keenly! I have long wandered in the path of sin. One after another, the tender chords of friendship that used to bind me to the world have snapped asunder; my name has become a by-word, and upon the earth I have been but a foul blot. But, sir, from henceforth I am a man! Up from the depths of its long grave, I have dragged forth my heart. I have sworn to touch the cup no more; and in my heart there is no lie. My wife and my children shall suffer no more for the sins they have never committed. I have seen my old employer, at the machine shop, and he has even been kind enough to give me an order in advance for necessary articles of clothing, food, and furniture. To-morrow morning I commence work."

"And you have come to see if you could obtain your cottage back again to live in," said Captain Walker, as Wilkins hesitated.

"Yes, sir, to see if I could hire it of you," returned the poor man.

"Wilkins, how much can you make at your business?" bluntly asked the old captain, without seeming to heed the request.

"My employer is going to put me on job-work, sir; and as soon as I get my hand in, I can easily make from twelve to fourteen dollars a week."

"And how much will it take to support your family?"

"As soon as I get cleared up, I can easily get along with five or six dollars a week."

"Then you might be able to save about four hundred dollars a year."

"I mean to do that, sir."

A few moments Captain Walker gazed into the face of his visitor, and then he asked,

"Have you pledged yourself yet?"

"Before God and in my heart I have; but one of my errands here was to get you to write me a pledge, and have it made to my wife and children."

Captain Walker sat down to his table, and wrote out the required pledge, and then, in a trembling, but bold hand, Thomas Wilkins signed it.

"Wilkins," said the old man, as he took his visitor by the hand, "I have watched well your countenance, and weighed your words. I know you speak the truth. When I bought the cottage from your creditors six years ago, I paid them one thousand dollars for it. It has not been harmed, and is as good as it was then. Most of the time I have received good rent for it. Now, sir, you shall have it for just what I paid for it, and each month you shall pay me such a sum as you can comfortably spare, till it is all paid. I will ask you for no rent, nor for a cent of interest. You shall have a deed of the estate, and in return I will take but a single note and mortgage, upon which you can have your own time."

Thomas Wilkins tried to thank the old man for his kindness, but he only sank back into his chair, and wept like a child; and while he sat with his face buried in his hands, the old man slipped from the room.

And when at length he returned, he bore in his hand a neatly covered basked.

"Come, come," the Captain exclaimed, "cheer up, my friend. Here are some titbits for your wife and children; take them home; and believe me, Wilkins, if you feel half as happy in receiving my favor as I do in bestowing it, you are happy indeed."

"O God! God will bless you for this, sir!" exclaimed the kindness-stricken man; "and if I betray your confidence, may I die on the instant!"

"Stick to your pledge, Wilkins, and I will take care of the rest," said the old captain, as his friend took the basket. "If you have time, to-morrow, call on me, and I will arrange the papers."

As Thomas Wilkins once more entered the street, his tread was light and easy. A bright light of joyousness shone in every feature, as he wended his way homeward; he felt, in every avenue of his soul, that he was once more a man.

The gloomy shades that ushered in the night of the thirty-first of December, had fallen over the snow-clad earth. Within the miserable dwelling of Mrs. Wilkins, there was more of comfort than we found when first we visited her, but yet nothing had been added to the furniture of the place. For the last six days, her husband had come home every evening, and gone away before daylight every morning, and, during that time, she knew that he had not drank any intoxicating beverage, for already had his face begun to assume the stamp of its former manhood, and every word that he had spoken had been kind and affectionate. To his children, he had brought new shoes and warm clothing, and to herself he had given such things as she stood in immediate need of; but yet, with all this, he had been taciturn and thoughtful, showing a dislike to all questions, and only speaking such words as were necessary. The poor, devoted, loving wife, began to hope. And why should she not? For six years her husband had not been thus before. One week ago she dreaded his approach; but now she found herself waiting for him with all the anxiety of former years. Should all this be broken? Should this new charm be swept away? Eight o'clock came, and so did nine, and ten, and yet her husband came not!

"Mother," said little Charles, just as the clock struck ten, seeming to have awakened from a dreary slumber. "Isn't this the last night of the old year?"

"Yes, my son."

"And do you know what I've been dreaming, dear mother? I dreamed that father had brought us New Year's presents, just as he used to. But he won't will he? He's too poor now!"

"No, my dear boy, we shall have no other presents than food; and even for that we must thank dear father. There, lay your head in my lap again."

The boy laid his curly head once more in his mother's lap, and with tearful eyes she gazed upon his innocent form.

The clock strikes eleven! The poor wife was yet on her tireless, sleepless watch! But hardly had the sound of the last stroke died away, ere the snow crust gave back the sound of a foot-fall, and in a moment more her husband entered. With a trembling fear she raised her eyes to his face, and a wild thrill of joy went to her heart, as she saw that all there was open and bold, only those manly features looked more joyous, more proud, than ever.

"Lizzie," said he, in mild, kind accents, "I am late to-night; business has detained me; and now I have a favor to ask of thee."

"Name it, dear Thomas, and you shall not ask a second time," cried the wife, as she laid her hand confidentially upon her husband's arm.

"And you will ask me no questions?" continued Wilkins.

"No, I will not."

"Then," continued her husband, as he bent over, and imprinted a kiss upon his wife's brow, "I want you to dress our children for a walk, and you shall accompany us. The night is calm and tranquil, and the snow is well trodden——"

"But——"

"Ah, no questions! Remember your promise."

Lizzie Wilkins knew not what all this meant, nor did she think to care; for anything that would please her husband she would have done with pleasure, even though it had wrenched her very heart-strings. In a short time Mrs. Wilkins put on such articles of dress as she could command, and soon they were in the road. The moon shone brightly, the stars peeped down upon the earth, and they seemed to smile upon the travelers from out their twinkling eyes of light. Silently Wilkins led the way, and silently his wife and children followed. Several times the wife gazed up into her husband's face, but, from the strange expression that rested there, she could make out nothing that tended to satisfy her.

At length, a slight turn in the road brought them suddenly upon the pretty white cottage, where, years before, they had been so happy. The snow in the front yard had been shoveled away, and a path led up the piazza. Wilkins opened the gate; his wife, trembling, followed, but wherefore she knew not. Then her husband opened the door, and in the entry they were met by the smiling countenance of old Captain Walker, who ushered them into the parlor, where a warm fire glowed in the grate, and every thing looked neat and comfortable. Mrs. Wilkins turned her gaze on the old man, and then upon her husband. Surely, in that greeting between the poor man and the rich, there was none of that constraint which would have been expected. They met rather as friends and neighbors. What could it mean?

Hark! the clock strikes twelve! The old year is gone; a new, bright-winged cycle is about to commence its flight over the earth.

Thomas Wilkins took the hand of his wife within his own, and then, drawing from his bosom a paper, he placed it in her hand, remarking, as he did so:

"Lizzie, this is your husband's present for the new year."

The wife took the paper and opened it. She realized its contents at a glance, but she could not read it word for word, for the streaming tears of a wild, frantic joy, would not let her. With a quick, nervous movement, she placed the priceless pledge next her bosom; and then, with a low murmur, like the gentle whispering of some heaven-bound angel, she fell, half fainting, into her husband's arms.

"Look up, look up, my own dear wife," uttered the redeemed man, "look up and smile upon your husband; and you, too, my children, gather about your father; for a husband and father, henceforth, I will ever be. Look up my wife. There, now, Lizzie, feel proud with me, for we stand within our own house! Yes, this cottage is once more our own; and nothing but the hand of death shall take us hence. Our good, kind friend here will explain it all. O Lizzie, if there be happiness on earth, it shall henceforth be ours! Let the past be forgotten, and with this, the dawning of a new year, let us commence to live in the future."

Gently the husband and wife sank upon their bending knees, clasped each other's arms, and, clinging joyfully to them, knelt their conscious happy children. A prayer from the husband's lips wended its way to the Throne of Grace; and, with the tears trickling down his aged face, old Captain Walker responded a heart-felt "Amen."

* * * * *

Five years have passed since that happy moment. Thomas Wilkins has cleared his pretty cottage from all incumbrance, and a happier or more respected family does not exist. And Lizzie, that gentle, confiding wife, as she takes that simple paper from the drawer, and gazes again and again on the magic pledge it bears, weeps tears of joy anew. Were all the wealth of the Indias poured out in one glittering, blinding pile at her feet, and all the honors of the world added thereto, she would not, for the whole countless sum, give in exchange one single word from that pledge which constituted her husband's present. THE NECESSITY OF REVIVALS.

BY LYMAN BEECHER, D. D.

I have lately heard disparaging remarks concerning revivals—that they were attended with so many defects, that their absence was better than their presence, and that, on the whole, we had better go back to the good old days when revivals were unknown, and the minister had easy times—when no such attacks were made upon his heart, and conscience, and intellect, but that he could spend most of his time on his farm, fattening his hogs and getting in his crops, while if he preached half a century he would never hear of a conversion. I would ask these croakers at revivals how many friends of missions would have been mustered if there had been no revivals? My brethren, we must have revivals. It must rain faster or we perish with drought. There is no such thing as a growing, progressive Church, without them; no such thing as a prosperous country, without them. God has never multiplied his people, never built up his kingdom rapidly, without them, and never will. This is the thought I would impress upon those who hear me—the indispensable necessity of revivals of religion to perpetuate the Church and to convert the world.

1. Revivals are necessary as a kind of substitute for miracles. God is the author of conversion; but not in the way of miracles—not without reference to and conformity with the laws of mind. Miracles cannot convert the soul. How many of those who witnessed the miracles of Christ, do you suppose were converted by the prodigies that astounded them? Miracles had their use; but that use was not the conversion of the soul. But now their object is accomplished, the Gospel is authenticated, the work is under motion. Hear the world roar as it rushes along, and see, as civilization advances, wealth accumulates, luxury abounds, and society rises higher and higher, how men dislike the humbling doctrines of the cross! Religion becomes offensive; the Gospel is odious; and, if they go on, they will scout it out of the world with their sneers and contempt. How are you to make head against all this accumulating hatred? By jogging along in the good old orthodox way? No; men will go to hell by whole generations, if something be not done. But go into a church filled with these gay, self-sufficient, contemptuous schemers, when the Spirit of God is abroad, and the atmosphere of revivals envelops the mass. Then see how they stir; what an arrest is put upon the current of their worldliness! The whole town is affected. Conviction spreads from heart to heart, like fire in a dry forest. Everybody feels, and you cannot tell why. In Litchfield, Conn., during a great revival, I would hear of conversions taking place simultaneously ten miles apart, without any contact of intercommunion. The Gospel then took hold. It was invested with a kind of almightiness. It is impossible for the truth to make such an impression at any other time. We must have revivals if the world is ever to be converted. To wait till the church is filled with the droppings of the sanctuary, is to wait forever. On the ratio of conversions which take place under an old, cozy, orthodox ministry, it would take to all eternity to convert the world. We must travel faster. A nation must be born in a day.

2. We must have revivals, to keep pace with the progress of the world's education, civilization, philosophy, business, thought. Every thing now goes ahead, and nothing but revivals will keep us in hailing distance of the world. The Church is in the world; and if the world goes ten times as fast as formerly, we need ten times the power to keep our hold upon it. A Church, in the days of the Puritans, could endure a season of dearth and destitution for seventy years, and yet keep alive. But ten years of destitution will do more injury in a Church now than seventy then. If we went along in the old pace, we should soon be out of sight. The world would soon leave us so far behind that we could not be discerned with a telescope.

3. We need revivals to secure the ministration of sound Scriptural doctrine. The carnal mind is enmity toward God, and where conversions are unfrequent, the worldly spirit predominates. I have seen the time when men's minds were impressed with an omnipresent awe. Some were vexed and some trembled as I preached the severe, humbling doctrines of the cross; but not a dog wagged his tongue. The presence of the revival enabled me to preach, without let or hindrance, the whole truth. But just as soon as the revival subsided, and the pressure was taken off, for me to have preached those same truths would have created an insurrection. We must have revivals, or we shall stand a chance to meet the mob. The world will not endure sound doctrine without the power of revivals.

4. We need revivals to prevent the fatal effects of doctrinal formality. Many good people seem to think, that if they have the Shorter Catechism in their houses, and especially if they have taught their children to "say" it, all will be well. I don't know of any thing more stupefying, Lethean, than a dead orthodoxy. Orthodoxy, without revivals, will produce formality. There are a great many ways to hell, and I do not know but the orthodox way is as fatal as any. He who lives on, trusting to the saving power of his creed, may be sure he is riding down the broad road at a railroad speed.

I do not wish to speak of myself; but if there be a thing for which I desire to thank God, it is that he has permitted me to have some part in the glorious work of revivals. I am an old man and on the verge of eternity; I would say, if I had a thousand lives, they should be devoted to the ministry of revivals. You will ask me, how are revivals to be obtained? Take this, perhaps the last counsel of an old man; for I shall soon leave the world. I never yet had a revival unexpectedly, or on the mere ground that God is a sovereign, and pours out his Spirit when and where he pleases. This doctrine never yet led to revivals. I always sought and labored for them, carefully watching the indications of Providence, and endeavoring, by the grace of God, to seize upon the appropriate moment. If the time came when efforts seemed called for, I made them. If I found my own heart not prepared for a revival, I took it to the throne of grace for correction. Revivals, like all good things, are to be labored for diligently and faithfully. Do any of you feel the need of a revival in your Churches? There is my experience. Prayer and labor, faith and works. Let me add, the preaching I have found to be most successful was doctrinal. I never wrote articles for the press, with rounded periods and polished style, to do execution with in a revival. I never had any freedom when I was obliged to read my sermon so closely that I could not make a gesture. Such sermons always grow cold in the mouth, and freeze the hearts of the hearers. I taught them they were rebels against God—the doctrine of total depravity—defining what I meant by it, and, by all means, what it didn't mean; and then, after stating the doctrine as clearly as I could, I endeavored to send it home. I never did any good with a sermon which had no application. Men are not so eager for the truth that they will pick it up. Other animals may do it, but sinners will not. Sermons ought to be made properly for execution. The Church will never do her duty without revivals.

JUDSON, THE CHRISTIAN HERO.

While many appear to believe, in these uninteresting days, that Christian profession is very much a pretence, and Christianity itself getting rather effete, and showing symptoms of evident decrepitude, be it ours to inspire a truer faith in humanity, and a loftier persuasion of the limitless power of single-mindedness, by the well authenticated facts of Dr. Judson's life. Milton finely expounds the theory of all true greatness, when he says, that "he who would not be frustrate of his hope to write well hereafter in all laudable things, ought himself to be a true poem; that is, a composition and pattern of the best and honorablest thing; not presuming to sing high praises of heroic men of famous cities, unless he have in himself the experience and the practice of all that which is praiseworthy." In Dr. Judson's life we have such a poem; as marvelous for its severe dignity, as for its extreme simplicity. He gave "thirty-eight years of manly toil for the redemption of a people who robbed him, loaded him with fetters, cast him into dungeons and death prisons, and drove him bare-footed over burning sands;" he consecrated at one time fifteen hundred, and at another five thousand dollars, received for literary and linguistic labors, to the mission cause; translated the whole Bible into the second most complicated language of the East; compiled the first dictionary, a very voluminous work, in the same tongue; never deeming, and apparently of so guileless a spirit that he never seems to have thought of it, that by these prodigious labors and endurances he was laying the foundation of a world-wide celebrity; and finally died, as a good, great man would desire to die, in exultant persuasion of a better life beyond the grave.—London Monthly Christian Spectator.

"I WOULD NOT LIVE ALWAY."

We have been so repeatedly urged, (says Dr. Muhlenberg, its author,) to give the whole of the original of "I would not live alway," that we at length comply, though somewhat reluctantly, as it has appeared at various times in print before—first in the Philadelphia Episcopal Recorder, somewhere about the year 1824. It was written without the most remote idea that any portion of it would ever be employed in the devotions of the Church. Whatever service it has done in that way, is owing to the late Bishop of Pennsylvania, then the Rector of St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, who made the selection of the verses out of the whole, which constitutes the present Hymn, and offered it to the Committee on Hymns, appointed by the General Convention of ——. The Hymn was, at first, rejected by the Committee, of which the unknown author was a member, who, upon a satirical criticism being made upon it, earnestly voted against its adoption. It was admitted on the importunate application of Dr. Onderdonk to the Bishops on the Committee. The following is a revised copy of the original.

"I would not Live Alway."

I would not live alway—live alway below!
Oh, no, I'll not linger, when bidden to go.
The days of our pilgrimage granted us here,
Are enough for life's woes, full enough for its cheer,
Would I shrink from the path which the prophets of God,
Apostles and martyrs, so joyfully trod?
While brethren and friends are all hastening home,
Like a spirit unblest, o'er the earth would I roam?

I would not live alway—I ask not to stay,
Where storm after storm rises dark o'er the way;
Where, seeking for peace, we but hover around,
Like the patriarch's bird, and no resting is found;
Where hope, when she plants her gay bow in the air,
Leaves its brilliance to fade in the night of despair,
And joy's fleeting angel ne'er sheds a glad ray,
Save the gloom of the plumage that bears him away.

I would not live alway—thus fettered by sin,
Temptation without, and corruption within;
In a moment of strength, if I sever the chain,
Scarce the victory's mine ere I'm captive again.
E'en the rapture of pardon is mingled with fears,
And my cup of thanksgiving with penitent tears;
The festival trump calls for jubilant songs,
But my spirit her own miserere prolongs.

I would not live alway—no, welcome the tomb;
Since Jesus hath lain there, I dread not its gloom,
Where He deigned to sleep, I'll too bow my head,
Oh, peaceful the slumbers on that hallowed bed.
And then the glad dawn soon to follow that night,
When the sunrise of glory shall beam on my sight,
When the full matin song, as the sleepers arise
To shout in the morning, shall peal thro' the skies.

Who, who would live alway? away from his God,
Away from yon heav'n, that blissful abode,
Where the rivers of pleasure flow o'er the bright plains,
And the noontide of glory eternally reigns;
Where the saints of all ages in harmony meet,
Their Saviour and brethren transported to greet,
While the songs of salvation exultingly roll,
And the smile of the Lord is the feast of the soul.

That heavenly music! what is it I hear?
The notes of the harpers ring sweet in the air;
And see, soft unfolding, those portals of gold!
The King all array'd, in His beauty behold!
O, give me, O, give me the wings of a dove!
Let me hasten my flight to those mansions above;
Aye, 'tis now that my soul on swift pinions would soar,
And in ecstacy bid earth adieu evermore. W. A. M.

WALDENSIAN PRAYER-MEETING.

The Rev. J. P. Thompson, in his account of his visit to the Waldenses, gives the following interesting sketch of a prayer-meeting which he attended among them.

By far the most interesting incident in our visit to the Vaudois, was an evening prayer-meeting at the house of one of the villagers. About eighty persons were assembled in two connecting rooms, crowding them to their utmost capacity. No one in particular seemed to have charge of the meeting, but, as in primitive times, if any one had a psalm, a prayer, a prophecy, he gave utterance to it; yet all things were done decently, and in order. First, some one proposed a hymn, which was sung with that unction which characterizes the devotional singing of the French; then another hymn was proposed, and for a while the simple singing of hymns was made to feed the devotional spirit of the assembly. The hymns were remarkably spiritual. After the singing, a young man rose and offered a most fervent and affecting prayer. The master of the house then asked if any one had a chapter to propose. The first chapter of the second epistle of Peter was mentioned; all produced their Bibles while one read the chapter. There was then "opportunity for remark"—which was improved, not in the way of general exhortation, but in the way of comment on the chapter read, and the application of it to the assembly. First, the young man who had led in prayer commented in a very lucid manner on verses 5, 6 and 7—to the effect that a Christian profession, a belief that Christ came into the world to save sinners, &c., was nothing without a development of the Christian graces in the daily life; then an elderly man, whom I took to be his father, called attention to the fact that all these graces and attainments were to be added to faith, and therefore it was of the first importance that the faith be right; a third then exhorted to a personal examination as to whether these graces did exist, and turned, with repeated emphasis, the declaration that "he that lacketh these things is blind;" a fourth adverted to the fact that all is summed up in the "knowledge of Christ," which he described as an infinite abyss. "Being unexpectedly called upon for a few remarks," I stammered out in broken French our Christian salutations; told them that we knew their history; honored their name and faith, and, in common with all the friends of Christ, felt our obligations to them for having kept their faith in purity; that we rejoiced in their spirit, and regarding them as the hope of Italy and the hope for the truth in Italy, should pray for them, and exhort Christians to pray for them continually. The exercises were concluded with singing and prayer, in which we, our friends, and our country, were most affectionately commended to God. At the close of the meeting, they gathered around us and grasped our hands in cordial salutation. They also presented us with a copy of their hymn book, as a souvenir.

Self-esteem is commonly punished by universal contempt. He that praises himself, remains a debtor to all others.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, April 7, 1853.

ROTUNDITY OF THE EARTH AND THE SABBATH.

In our remarks, last week, upon the discourse of the Rev. Dr. Potts, we forgot to say that, among the objections which he advanced against such views as Seventh-day Baptists hold, the impossibility of observing the same absolute time every where on the surface of the globe was one. The cavalier manner in which he stated this objection, carried the idea that he considered it unanswerable; and if the impression left upon his hearers was that the observers of the seventh day are so far behind the age, that they do not even know that the world is round, it was probably just such an impression as he would not care about removing. But we would ask the Doctor a few questions on this point.

1. Do you not teach that it is the duty of Christians, every where on the surface of the globe, to observe the first day of the week as holy time?

2. Do you not teach that there is, in the New Testament, what is equivalent to an express law, requiring the observance of the first day of the week, to the exclusion of any and every other day of the septenary cycle, because that, and that only, fitly commemorates the resurrection of Jesus? If this is not your teaching, we greatly misunderstand you.

3. When you insist upon this duty of sanctifying the first day of the week, do you mean that Christians should every where observe the same absolute time?

4. If you can pertinaciously contend for the universal observance of Sunday, (as you evidently do,) without meaning to insist upon the same absolute time, why may not Seventh-day Baptists contend for the universal observance of Saturday, without having it flung at them that they contend for what is impracticable?

5. When you insist upon the first day of the week as the proper time for sabbatizing, do you not mean the weekly return of that very day on which Christ is supposed to have risen from the dead? Does it ever enter your mind, that this is quite as impracticable as to observe the weekly returns of the day on which God ceased from the work of creation?

6. Between New York and Jerusalem interpose more than a hundred degrees of longitude, making about seven hours difference in time. Do you not as actually and truly keep the first day of the week as the Christians of Jerusalem do, although you begin and end your observance seven hours later? On the supposition that the day ends at six o'clock in the evening, the Christians of Jerusalem are through with their Sunday observance, about the time you are ready to commence preaching in the morning. Yet you go on with your observance, afternoon and evening, all the time alluding to the day as the day of the Saviour's resurrection; and we take for granted, that you mean what you say.

Certainly, the Doctor's fling at Seventh-day Baptists, (though he did not mention them by name,) was a virtual destruction of his own argument. Those who are so earnest for the observance of a particular day themselves, and plead for it on a particular ground, namely, that it commemorates an important fact, which cannot be so fitly commemorated on any other day, should not attribute folly to others for carrying out the same principle. Whatever force there is in the objection alluded to, it is, nevertheless, an objection which the advocates of Sunday observance have no business to avail themselves of. For whether they can observe the same absolute time, or not, they know that they can, and do, observe the first day of the week.

Suppose a person should set out from Jerusalem to make the circuit of the globe; suppose it to be required of the inhabitants of each country, through which he travels, to do him homage as he passes along; and suppose him to possess such extraordinary power of locomotion, that he can make the whole circuit in twenty-four hours. In seven hours he arrives in New York, and receives the homage of the citizens. But suppose some person should suggest, that the New Yorkers were not honoring the same identical person that the people of Jerusalem did, because they did not do it at the same absolute time; who would not see the folly of the suggestion? The obvious reply would be, that they were simply required to honor him when he came to them, and while he continued with them.

We presume, therefore, that should it be suggested to Dr. Potts, that he did not observe the first day of the week, because he did not observe the same absolute moments which were observed by Christians in Jerusalem, he would reply, that he was not required to observe them; that he was not required to observe the first day of the week, till it had arrived where he was. He would say, 'The day starts from Jerusalem, at such an hour; when it arrives here, I will begin to do it honor, and will continue to do so, as long as it stays; and in doing so, I honor the same day which started from Jerusalem seven hours before. He never dreams of honoring a different day, because its arrival in New York is seven hours after it has left Jerusalem; he knows it is the same day, and he observes it as such.

Now, if the Doctor, and his associates, will be magnanimous enough to give us the benefit of the same mode of reasoning which they would, unquestionably, employ themselves, were they disputing with anti-sabbatarians, it is all we will ask of them. T. B. B.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Crystal Palace—Infant "Baptism"—Popery in Prussia—The Pope and the Emperor.

GLASGOW, March 18th, 1853.

The Crystal Palace Company held a meeting yesterday in London. Their prospects are stated to be most satisfactory, as applications already made for exhibition space will ensure a revenue of £40,000. Of their 349 acres purchased, they have sold 149 at a profit of £50,000. The public opening of the place must, however, it is added, be necessarily delayed for several months. The Palace Railway Company's Bill was, last night, read a third time in the House of Commons, and passed. No proposal has been made in this Bill to introduce the subject of the Palace Sunday opening. A few days ago, indeed, on the Bill being received from committee, and the motion having been made for its further consideration by the House, Mr. Spooner, referring to a clause in the agreement between the Railway and Palace Companies, as to the tickets of the former giving admission to the Palace, said that advantage could be taken of the clause for evading the law on Sunday. But the Chairman of the Palace Company being present, stated that the Directors were not aware that the clause could be so understood, and that they would be quite willing that it should be struck out on the third reading of the Bill—as they would not take indirect means to evade the obligations of their charter. The Record newspaper says that Mr. Hume, M. P., has advised a younger Member to bring in a Bill to repeal the Act of George III. enforcing Sunday sanctification. If this should be the result of the agitation for preventing the opening of the Exhibition Building on that day, the friends of the traditionary holiday would have little reason for congratulation. At a meeting of those opposed to the Sunday opening of that building, in the parish of St. George's, London, last Sabbath, the Rev. J. T. Baylee, Secretary of the Sunday Observance Society, referred to reports of a dispute between the Palace Company and Mr. Mayhew, and said he could inform the meeting, that "the opinions of Mr. Mayhew on this subject had undergone a change; for he had admitted, that if the Crystal Palace were opened on Sunday, it would become the vilest place of resort in the kingdom." If Sunday were indeed the Sabbath, as we know it is not, we should be opposed to its being open on that day, but such a change in the opinions of Mr. Mayhew would require to be authenticated by himself, or at least stated by some less suspicious channel than through the Secretary of the Sunday Observance Society—in a speech for Sunday observance purposes. On the other side of the question, the Rev. John Griffith, Vicar of Aberdane, in South Wales, says if it were not for Sunday railway trains, there would be ten times more Sunday desecration than there is. If all the Sunday trains were stopped, he says, "there would then be no living here." The Record of the 14th instant, states that at a recent meeting of the Directors of the Ipswich Museum, recently erected, Mr. Fonnereau offered to subscribe £10 towards the defraying of the debt, "on condition that the poor be admitted on the Sunday evenings, from Lady-day to Michaelmas." It is uncertain whether, on the terms, the subscription was accepted.

Zeal for Infant Baptism was lately manifested in Germany to a remarkable extent. A cabinet-maker, named Christ, who is also a Minister of the Baptist Church, had a child born to him. He received repeated monitions from the parish minister and church wardens, to get his child christened. He gave no heed to them; and, after several weeks, during which they insisted and threatened, Dean Keim, with two or three ecclesiastical officers, proceeded to Christ's house, to compel him to submit. The father resisted, and while he held the child with one arm, protected it with the other, quoting Scripture proofs against what they had come to effect. Finding their efforts otherwise unavailing, they procured assistance, and sent the father to prison while they made his child a Christian—liberating the father when the deed was done.

The Nonconformist says, that according to the last official statement of the various religious denominations of the population of Prussia, the Catholics number 6,063,186; the Protestants, 9,987,277; the Mennonites, and members of the Greek Church, and Jews, together, 234,551—making in whole, 16,285,014. The population has increased since this census to 17 millions. The king of Prussia, although he has allowed Popery too much latitude, has an aversion to the Jesuits, and lately interdicted them from preaching in any of the churches in his dominions. At Rome, that wily fraternity are meditating, in consequence, plans of attack upon the Protestantism of Prussia, with a determination to exterminate it.

The French Emperor, though he has been coquetting with the Pope, in order to get him to come to Paris to put the crown upon his head, is said, after all his concessions, to be in danger of losing his reward—not through lack of willingness on the part of the Pope himself, but by the opposition of the Romish conclave. Should the latter succeed in preventing Popish oil being poured on the head of the French Emperor by the hand of the Romish Apostasy, they may provoke to a reaction one who has sufficiently evidenced that a regard to his own ambition is the leading motive in all he does. The favor hitherto shown to their church can hardly be ascribed to any love on his part to its perversions; but, should they provoke his ire, that may be exhibited without dissimulation. The cause of suffering Protestantism in that country may profit through the quarrel—if the Lord so design. J. A. BEGG.

ANTI-SUNDAY-MAIL MEETING.

At an adjourned meeting of the citizens of New Haven, which was held for the purpose of considering what might be done for the purpose of stopping the Sunday Mail Train recently established between Boston and New-York, after addresses by Dr. Bacon, Prof. Silliman, Rev. Mr. Littlejohn, C. B. Lines, James Brewster, and others, the following resolutions were passed:—

Resolved, That, inasmuch as no department of commerce or business has suffered any detriment in consequence of the omission of Sunday mails between New York and Boston for more than ten years past; and inasmuch as the electric telegraph affords every facility for the instantaneous transmission of intelligence in any emergency; the recent arrangement on the part of the United States Government for the conveyance of mails on the Lord's Day, between those two cities, disturbing the quiet of the day in all the towns and villages along the route, and imposing servile labor upon a multitude of persons employed by the Government and by the Railroad Companies, is a wholly unnecessary violation of that day of rest which the great body of the American people honor with a religious observance.

Resolved, That inasmuch as the Government of the United States has no control over the railways, the directors of the railway companies that have come into the arrangement complained of, are responsible for that arrangement to the public sentiment of their fellow-citizens and to the States under which they hold their charters.

Resolved, That even if the conveyance of the mails for the Government of the United States were a matter of absolute necessity, the running of railway carriages for the conveyance of passengers on the Lord's Day, thus bringing the heathenism of New York into contact on that day with our more peaceable and orderly towns and villages, and at the Lord's time tempting our young men to spend their Sabbaths amidst the dissipations of the great metropolis, is an offense against the welfare of the community, and a wrong for which there ought to be a remedy.

Resolved, That Benjamin Silliman, Leonard Bacon, A. Littlejohn, James Brewster, James F. Babcock, Henry Trowbridge, Capt. Foote, John G. North, and Lucius R. Finch, be a committee to correspond with gentlemen in other places, and to take measures, by petition to the Legislature or otherwise, for the redress of this grievance, so that it may be determined whether our Sabbaths are henceforth at the mercy of a few great moneyed corporations.

☞ We copy the above from The Independent. It will be seen, that no attempt is made to show that Sunday mail trains are a breach of God's law, or that they are impolitic in a pecuniary view. That they are unnecessary—that they make railroad directors responsible to public sentiment—that they take city heathen into contact with orderly and peaceable towns, and tempt country people to visit the city on Sunday—these are the strong points of objection. We have no idea that they will prove strong enough to affect the Legislature or the railroad directors. What a pity that these zealous friends of Sunday sanctification have no "thus saith the Lord" to sanction and give weight to their movements.

READING.

What should our Reading be? And how?

The importance of reading is in some measure appreciated by every reader. It is a point so frequently discussed, that it has become like a thrice-told tale. All acknowledge the influence and benefit of reading. Books are continually widening and deepening their power over mind. Thought is developed and guided, comparatively less by hearing, and more by reading, than in former ages.

If such is the fact, there is intimately connected with it a question of great importance, viz: What should we read?

1. We should read what pertains to our business or profession. Whatever may be our calling, there should be a thorough and careful professional reading connected therewith. It consists in reading works explanatory of our business—works that illustrate its principles, record the various discoveries and improvements, in short, whatever directly tends to better prepare us to meet our professional duties. The importance and even the necessity of an extensive reading of this sort, is too obvious to need proof.

2. The moving world is continually developing new facts, new laws, and new principles. The news of the day—the record that the present makes in passing—should be studied. The workings and tendencies of sects and societies, parties and politics, institutions, both mercenary and benevolent, moral and immoral—the unfoldings of art and science—should be carefully conned, and, if possible, comprehended. No one can meet the duties of a man in his social, political, and moral relations, without knowing the times in which he lives—without understanding the present.

3. The past should be understood; hence history should be read. By history we are able to wander back through the long colonnades of past events, to where man was when the star of empire first arose, and ascertain the workings of the human mind as developed in society, laws, customs, and governments. History is the magic lantern by which we are enabled to see the varied shades and hues presented by humanity, in its transition from savage to civilized—in its onward and upward march.

4. We should cultivate an acquaintance with literature. We should be familiar, at least, with the English authors. There are many bright luminaries in the "firmament of English literature." These shed their brightest and purest rays upon those who go to them, purifying, expanding, and ennobling their thoughts. Poetry, especially, should be read, to give variety of thought and expression, and to awaken or cultivate a taste for the beautiful and grand, as expressed in language.

> "He whose heart is weary of the strife
> Of meaner spirits, and whose mental gaze
> Would shun the dull, cold littleness of life,
> Awhile to dwell amidst sublimer days,
> Must turn to thee"——

5. But a knowledge of ourselves—our relations, our destiny, and our obligations, transcends all other knowledge. We should diligently, studiously, read those works that most plainly point out our physical and spiritual natures and relations. Books of a moral and religious nature are powerful aids in the culture of our spirits. They furnish an exhaustless store-house of garnered wisdom and experience of the great and good of past ages, from which we may draw large supplies of truth, ready prepared for our minds. To these should we pay frequent visits—especially to the pure and original fountain of all—the BIBLE. Study the character of God in his triune revelation—Nature, Providence, and the HOLY SCRIPTURES.

Intimately connected with the inquiry of what we should read, is that of, How shall we read?

The following rules are appended, not because they are new and untried, but because they are old, and sanctioned by long usage, and approved by the experience of those who ought to know.

1. Read slowly and carefully the best books that can be obtained on the subject under consideration—reading no faster than can be fully understood and treasured up in the mind for future use.

2. Read much by topics. Select a subject, and read the best works on that subject, both pro and con.

3. In reading, have, at the same time, system and variety. Let, for instance, periodical literature fill up the oft-recurring spare moments of time, while for longer and stated periods read according to some well-arranged plan, if not in succession, works on History, Art, Science, Philosophy, Poetry, Law, Medicine, Morals, and Religion.

4. Keep, at least, an index of what is read. Keep your knowledge always at command by frequent reviews. Think often upon your reading—striving to reduce it to general principles—separating, if possible, the true from the false, the good from the bad.

5. Write upon subjects about which you read, for the sake of accuracy—converse, for the sake of readiness, and apply the whole to good and useful purposes. MACOM.

REVIVAL IN BROOKFIELD.

CLARKVILLE, March 29th, 1853.

Presuming that information concerning the prosperity of the work of God would interest the readers of the Rocorder, I respectfully submit the following brief notice of an interesting season of revival which the inhabitants of this village and vicinity have been sharing for the last two months.

It is eight or nine weeks since a series of evening meetings commenced in the Methodist Episcopal Church in this village, which continued every evening for about five weeks, and since every other evening. In this meeting, I am happy to say, the other churches in the place have not only taken a deep interest, but have also shared the gracious refreshing from the presence of the Lord. This protracted effort, under God's great blessing, in answer to the united prayers and labors of his people here, has resulted very encouragingly. Some fifty-eight have already submitted to baptism, (if we include nine that have been either sprinkled or poured,) and have united with the churches here. Last Sabbath, seventeen happy believers, after the example of Jesus, were buried with him in baptism, sixteen of whom united with the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church of Brookfield. This is the Lord's doing, and is marvelous in our eyes. To his name we give all the praise.

Yours as ever, J. CLARKE.

TO CALIFORNIA EMIGRANTS.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, writing from Weaverville, Alta Cal., Monday, Feb. 7, 1853, says:—

Could that portion of your readers, who are so anxious to come to California, know how small a chance they would stand to make a fortune and return home in safety, they would at once banish every thought of coming here. A large share of those here are worse off than they were at home. Their brightest hopes of amassing a speedy fortune are blasted. And hundreds may be seen in every part of California, strolling about, who would be glad to work for their board. The miners in the north, about Shasta and Weaverville, are paying about $5 per day to those who labor faithfully. Board costs $20 per week. After deducting the cost of clothing and liquor bills from the remaining $10, nothing much remains. A person without capital or friends to aid him, is better off in the States.

MEETINGS AT LEONARDSVILLE, N. Y.—A letter from Eld. Wm. B. Maxson, dated April 1st, says: "Our series of Evening Meetings resulted in the revival of a goodly number of our backslidden members, and the hopeful conversion of a number of young people. Eight or ten baptisms have followed."

ELD. C. M. LEWIS having removed his location from the Third to the First Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, R. I., requests his correspondents to address him at Ashaway, R. I.

AN EXAMPLE.—It was stated, some weeks ago, that Albert Barnes had tendered his resignation of the pastoral care of the First Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, on the ground that, from the partial loss of his eyesight, he was unable to fulfill his part of the contract between himself and the congregation. But the members of the congregation unanimously declined accepting his resignation, and have adopted resolutions by which a co-pastor is to be appointed to relieve Mr. Barnes; he still continuing to be regarded as their pastor, with no change in their relations except such as required by the calamity above referred to. The congregation, it was stated, had ceased to regard their connection with their respected and beloved pastor in the light of a business contract; he had served them with all his strength and ability for more than twenty years, during the best days of his useful life, and they could not consent to separate from him now that, by those very efforts, he had nearly lost the inestimable blessing of sight. Such conduct on the part of the congregation is highly praiseworthy, and is an example deserving of imitation.

ACTIVITY AND RESULTS OF METHODISM.—Zion's Herald has the following calculation in regard to the outlays of the Methodist denomination for meeting-houses, parsonages, &c:

"In the incredibly short space of eighty-seven years, it has built four thousand two hundred and twenty churches, (which is little less than one for every week of her existence,) at a cost of fourteen millions seven hundred and thirty-five thousand five hundred and seventy-one dollars. It has also erected and endowed its colleges and numerous academies with large sums. It has built innumerable parsonages, and supplied itself with church and Sabbath-school literature. Now, most of these churches having been newly erected, rebuilt, or remodeled, and most of these vast outlays having been made within the last quarter of a century, we think it no exaggeration to estimate the expenditures of Methodism in the United States, for home purposes, at an average of very little short of one million of dollars per annum for twenty-five years. In addition to that, it has paid for the support of its ministry."

MAINE LAW MOVEMENTS.—The Legislature of Maine has, by a vote of more than two to one, passed a bill amendatory of the original Liquor Law—removing all chance of evasion, and increasing the stringency of the measure. Hopes were entertained by the opponents of the law, that Gov. Crosby would veto it, but he disappointed them by signing it.

The new Legislative Assembly of Minnesota has allowed the Maine Law to be defeated by one majority. The preceding Legislature passed, the People voted upon and ratified it, and then the Territorial Judge decided it unconstitutional, because the people had opposed it! Now an attempt to renew its vitality, by passing it without submission to the people, has been defeated.

In the Assembly of Wisconsin, the Maine Law failed by the close vote of 33 to 32, and this on a motion to postpone indefinitely. Previous motions to reject, to table, &c., had been defeated.

UNCLE TOM'S MISSION.—The Congregationalist, after recounting what is known of the number of editions and translations of Uncle Tom's Cabin, says:—

"Assuming now that the entire circulation of the book, in all editions and all languages, has reached the number of two and a half millions of copies, and proceeding upon the extremely moderate computation that each copy has been read by at least eight persons—we may reasonably conclude that, as the result of the first twelvemonth of his missionary labor, Uncle Tom has preached the truth to an audience of not less than twenty millions of people! Truthful indeed was the remark of Putnam's Monthly, that, 'never since books were first printed has the success of Uncle Tom been equaled. The history of literature contains nothing parallel to it, nor approaching it;—it is, in fact, the first real success in book-making, for all other successes in literature were failures when compared with the success of Uncle Tom.'"

NEGRO HUNTING.—The following appears as an advertisement in the Ouachita Register, a newspaper printed at Monroe, Louisania, dated June 1, 1852. What citizen of the United States—the Fugitive-Slave-Law United States—can read it and not blush for his country?

Negro Dogs.

The undersigned would respectfully inform the citizens of Ouachita and adjacent parishes, that he has located about two and a half miles east of John White, on the road leading from Monroe to Bastrop, and that he has a fine pack of dogs for catching negroes. Persons wishing negroes caught, will do well to give him a call. He can always be found at his stand when not engaged in hunting, and even then, information of his whereabouts can always be had of some one on the premises.

Terms.—Five dollars per day and found, where there is no track pointed out. When the track is shown, twenty-five dollars will be charged for catching the negro.

M. C. GOFF.

MONROE, Feb. 17, 1852.

"TOM MARSHALL" DEAD.—The telegraph announces that Hon. Thomas F. Marshall was killed by one of his tenants, near Maysville, Ky., on Wednesday, March 30. Mr. Marshall was a member of the 27th Congress. His hostility, in that capacity, to a National Bankrupt Law, brought him into collision with Col. Webb, a New York editor, which resulted in a duel. The Tribune says "that Mr. Marshall must have been about fifty years of age at the time of his death. Tall, erect, and graceful, he was one of the best natural orators of our country, with talent sufficient to fill any station with credit. But he lacked steadiness of purpose, and perhaps fixedness of principle. He had formerly drank too freely, but was converted to the faith of Total Abstinence in 1842, and became one of its most eloquent and attractive advocates. He never weaned himself, however, from the love of tobacco, which he continued to use immoderately, and which ultimately dragged him back to his old habit of drinking—we hope not to the excess to which he had at one time been addicted."

RAILROAD INJUNCTIONS.—An injunction on the Railroad through Second Avenue, N. Y., has been granted by Judge Edwards, who expressed the opinion, "that the Corporation, in making the grant in question, has been guilty of such a breach of trust as calls for the interposition of the Court. In the matter of the Broadway Railroad, the Supreme Court has reached a decision. It affirms the power of the Corporation to authorize the laying of a Railroad in Broadway or any other street, but puts an injunction on the particular scheme in question, on the ground that it involves a fraudulent use of that power. The Corporation has no more right to grant to one party, gratuitously, the privilege of laying and running a Railroad, when that privilege is valuable, and other parties are willing to pay for it, than to divide the parks and public buildings among its own members and their friends. The Judges hold that the grant to Sharp and others—the same which has brought upon so many Common-Councilmen the sentence to prison for contempt of Court—is proved to be thus dishonest in its nature, and avert its execution accordingly.

PROFESSOR LEE.—The late Professor, Dr. Samuel Lee, one of the most learned men of the nineteenth century, was a poor laborious working carpenter up to twenty years of age. He then became by his own exertions an eminent and accomplished scholar, and filled the situations of Professor of Arabic, and afterwards of Hebrew, in the Cambridge University, England. The Church and State Gazette publishes the following anecdote which serves to illustrate of what determined stuff the Professor was made:—

"A relative, who had been studying the flute for three years, and was rather proud of the result, induced Dr. Lee to listen to his performance; at the conclusion of which the player asked the listener what he thought of the flutist's proficiency. 'I think, (said Lee, with a smile,) that I could play as well in three weeks.' The Professor knew nothing of the instrument; but, amid his many and heavy labors, he addressed himself to the mastery of its difficulties, and in three weeks actually excelled his kinsman. The same energy marked all his pursuits; and they who lack that quality rarely achieve greatness."

ISLES OF THE OCEAN.—The Presbyterian Church of Nova Scotia has commenced a mission in Aneiteum, one of the numerous Isles of the wide Pacific Ocean, where a church of fifteen natives has been gathered—the first that has been formed among the Papuan race. "The cause of God triumphs," says Mr. Geddie, "in the face of all opposition. The people are fast forsaking their idolatry, and coming over to the Lord's side. The old house of worship having become too small, a larger one has been commenced. The school at the station numbers one hundred scholars, sixty of whom are females. At the several out-stations, about two hundred pupils are in the schools."

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

The will of P. J. Dewitt, which was contested in Warren county, N. J., has been affirmed. The opposition was based upon alleged unsoundness of mind on the part of the testator. Among the bequests are the following: Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, (old school,) $6,000; Presbyterian Board of Domestic Missions, (old school,) $2,000; American Seamen's Friend Society in the United States, $1,000; and the residue of his estate to the American Seamen's Friend Society.

GRACE GREENWOOD writes from Rome to The National Era as follows: "I met on this night a son of Mrs. Hemans. He resembles somewhat the portraits of the poetess—has, I should say, her eyes and hair. He is a peculiarly mild and pensive young man, whom you might almost believe had been reared on his mother's melancholy melodies. Mr. Hemans is a devout Roman Catholic. Think of the son of the author of 'The Forest Sanctuary' as a Papist!"

A dispatch from Boston, April 2, says: The Captain of the schooner Agrate, from Jeremie, reports that Charles Bishop, Wesleyan Missionary at Jeremie, while on his way on horseback, with a boy, from Aux Cayes, was attacked near Devil's Hole by a band of robbers, who knocked him down, robbed him of his porte-monnaie, and left him insensible upon the field. It was feared that he could not recover.

The present number of missionaries under the direction of the Presbyterian Board of Domestic Missions, is less by seventy-three than last year at this time. They have one missionary on the way to California, and two young brethren soon to graduate at a Theological Seminary, are accepted as future missionaries to the same field.

Rev. W. Speer, a Methodist minister, has opened a school for the Chinese in San Francisco. Since he went to that city he has been forming acquaintance with the Chinese, visiting them in their dwellings and their business, and devoting several days each week to the care and instruction of the sick at the Hospital. He has thus done much to gain their confidence.

Dr. Devan writes from Lyons, France, under date of February 4th, and states that another missionary agent, sustained in part by the friends of the American and Foreign Bible Society, has been thrown into prison. This is under the reign of Napoleon III. "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity."

Mr. Sturges, a Presbyterian, of Putnam, O., offers to give $10,000 for a library for the Ohio Methodist University at Delaware, provided the Methodist Church of Ohio will raise $15,000 more for a library building.

Some time since a Presbyterian of Rochester, N. Y., gave $10,000 to build free Methodist churches in that city, to meet the spiritual wants of a neglected population, who are as sheep without a shepherd.

For several weeks a silent yet powerful work of the Spirit has been in progress in the Union Congregational Church in New York, (Rev. Mr. Grinnell's.) Of the fruits of it, more than forty persons have been proposed for membership in the Church.

The Portland Mirror says that a gentleman has given $2,000 to Bowdoin College, to aid indigent young men in getting an education. But no one is to derive any benefit from the same, who uses either rum or tobacco.

European News.

By the steamers Franklin at New York, and Niagara at Boston, we have one week later dates from all parts of Europe.

In Parliament, Lord John Russel stated that the Government had received notice that the Grand Duke of Tuscany had liberated the Madiai family, and allowed them to leave Tuscany. The Herald, of the 19th, says: "We have much satisfaction in announcing, on the authority of our electric telegraph dispatch from France, that M. and Madame Madiai were permitted to leave Leghorn, on Wednesday last, for Marseilles."

At Risca Rock Vein Colliery, in Monmouth, an explosion occurred on the 12th March, killing 12 persons, and injuring a large number.

The advices from Paris state that Louis Napoleon had succeeded in obtaining the consent of the Pope to visit Paris in May next, to perform the Imperial Coronation, Austria and Prussia having relaxed their opposition.

A Republican demonstration, such as has never been seen since the coup d'état, took place in Paris, on the 13th, when nearly 20,000 men assembled and marched in procession as a cortege of the funeral of Madame Raspail, wife of the celebrated State prisoner of that name. A detachment of Cavalry and an immense force of Sergens de Ville prevented any speeches over the grave. The proceedings were conducted with perfect quietness. The immense line of men, five deep, marched with uncovered heads and in solemn silence past the Column of Liberty on the Place de la Rastille.

The butcher Haynau is dead. A dispatch from Vienna, March 14, says his death was quite unexpected. After his Italian journey, he appeared in excellent health. On Saturday he joined the other general officers at the Bellaria, and attracted the particular notice of his Majesty, who addressed him on passing with, "Mo salutation, General." Yesterday he was at the Mercantile Union, as usual. At midnight he returned to Munch's Hotel, where he was lodging, and soon retired to rest. At half-past one he summoned his valet, and directed him to fetch him a glass of water, as he felt unwell. When the man returned he found his master gasping for breath; in short, in the agonies of death. Medical assistance was immediately called in, and an attempt to take blood from the General's arm was made, but in vain; General Haynau had ceased to be.

An American lady had been arrested at Heidelberg, who came direct from the United States, for having a number of pamphlets declared by the Police to be of a revolutionary character.

New disturbances have arisen at Denizli, in Anatolia, Turkey, it is supposed in consequence of the heavy taxes. Conflicts took place in the streets, many lives were lost, 100 it is said; and the bazaar remained closed for some days.

The Overland Indian Mail had arrived in London, with dates from Calcutta to Feb. 5, Bombay Feb. 12, Rangoon Jan. 13. The news of a revolution at Ava was confirmed, and the King of Burmah had been deposed by his brother. An English Ambassador thereupon set out for the Capital.

Advices from China report the rapid and successful progress of the rebels.

The ship Dernice has been burnt by mutineer Javanese and Manilla men, and the Captain and officers murdered in the Straits of Gasper.

By the Overland Mail, arrived in London, intelligence had been received from Sydney to the 25th December, and Adelaide to the 10th January. The yield of gold at the Sydney diggings was reported greater than ever. The number of diggers at the various gold fields was near 100,000.

California News.

Two weeks later news, and $2,000,000 in gold dust, have been received from California since our last. We give a summary of the news.

There were thirty-six deaths among the passengers by the steamer Winfield Scott, on her last upward trip, from Panama to San Francisco. This terrible mortality is attributable to the epidemic which has prevailed on the Isthmus for some time past, and which seems to accompany all the steamers from Panama till they reach the cool atmosphere off the coast of California. From all accounts, the disease is as sudden in its attack, rapid in its course, and fatal in its consequences, as the cholera, and in fact bears a close resemblance to that fell scourge.

There had been many arrivals of ships, and breadstuffs and other provisions have fallen considerably in price.

The Monumental City steamship sailed from San Francisco on the 16th for Australia, under the conduct of Mr. Peter Strobel. One of Adams & Co.'s messengers has also been dispatched for the same destination. It is intended by the Express Company to establish a regular communication.

The clipper ship Trade Wind had arrived, bringing eight missionaries with their families, sent out by the American Home Missionary Society. The names of these gentlemen are Revs. E. B. Walworth, S. C. Harmon, Wm. C. Pond, Thomas Condon, James Pierpont, O. Dickenson, J. G. Hale, and S. B. Bell. Six will remain in California, and two will proceed to Oregon.

A mine of copper has recently been discovered about thirty miles from the town of Santa Barbara. Specimens showing about the average richness of the mine have been brought to San Francisco for the purpose of analyzation. They are found to contain about 44 per cent. of copper, 12 per cent. of silver, and 3 or 4 per cent. of gold.

Probably there never was a time, in the annals of California, when the highways and byways of the interior were more numerously beset with robbers and murderers than they are at present. For two weeks the leading theme of the country papers had been of outrages of every description, the greater part having been committed by the band of Mexican desperados under the lead of Joaquin. This bold villain is described to be a young man of not more than 19 years of age, endowed with mental powers superior in many respects to his countrymen in general, but distorted to the contrivance of the blackest designs, and so misapplied as to give to them brilliancy, force, and success in execution. He has hitherto most skilfully eluded all plans that have been laid for his capture; and the robberies and murders of his band have at last so thoroughly aroused the population of Calaveras and vicinity, that, according to last accounts, they have turned out by hundreds to scour the country, hunt down and hang their common enemy. Emboldened by his success, doubtless, several Americans even have gone on the highway.

The Troubles at San Juan.

The New York Tribune gives a statement of the difficulties at San Juan. It seems that the American sloop-of-war Cyane has taken forcible possession of the town of San Juan de Nicaragua, arresting the action of the regular authorities of the place, and annulling the decisions of the magistrates, in consequence of which the entire City Government have felt themselves constrained to resign their offices, leaving the commander of the ship alone to exercise authority and preserve order, so far as he can. At the same time, however, a Committee of Vigilance and Public Safety has been organized by the citizens, and such justice as our naval force do not execute or interfere with, will probably be administered by this body, according to the Lynch code.

The Cyane was sent to San Juan by the late administration, on the representation of the Accessary Transit Company, that their property and rights were in danger of violation at the hands of the City Government. A difference had grown up between the Company and the Government. The Company had long since succeeded in rendering itself exceedingly unpopular at San Juan. It was disliked, its agent was disliked, and its whole management was disliked. In addition to other causes of offense, the Company had moved their depot away from the city up the bay, on land leased of the Mosquito King, which they were bound by the lease to surrender whenever his agent at San Juan should require. It seems, however, that the Company claimed to hold the spot also by a grant from Nicaragua, made, however, when San Juan was in possession of the British as protectorate of the Mosquito. They had erected buildings there, and were drawing away from the town the profitable trade of the passengers to and from California. In order to avert this commercial diversion, the authorities got the Mosquitian agent to call for the surrender of the lease and the abandonment of the spot, alleging that they wanted it for a powder magazine and other purposes. The Company's agent refused to comply, and would not accept the offer of a gratuitous deed of land elsewhere suitable for its buildings. Hereupon it was determined to eject him and remove the buildings. Two of these, sheds of little value, were taken away by the City, and notice given that the whole must be cleared out within thirty days, or it would be done on legal process. But on the eve of the execution of this process, the Cyane arrives, and, on the representations of a clerk of the Company, without more ado, lands a corps of marines, and puts an end to the Courts of San Juan and their writ, under protest of the Mayor and Corporation, and to the great dissatisfaction of the citizens. The authorities, finding themselves under the control of military force, at once resigned.

General Taylor's Grave.—A correspondent of the Observer writes as follows, on a subject which ought to be of national interest: "To reach Gen. Taylor's grave, you must wind about through by ways, and finally stop before a small enclosure on the top of a hill in an open field, surrounded by a rude stone wall; and just on the other side of that wall you will see a very plain vault, with a front of limestone rocks, roughly hewn, and an iron door, and that you will be told is the tomb of the once famous General Zachary Taylor, President of the United States of America. No monument has been erected to his memory. His name has not even been inscribed on his vault! In the center of the small graveyard there is a monument erected to the memory of his father, Col. Richard Taylor, a revolutionary soldier." Five years ago Gen. Taylor was the idol of the nation!

A Heroine.—A family consisting of a mother and four children, was residing in the third story of Krostman's factory, which was burned at Cincinnati a few days ago. Finding herself cut off from retreat, in consequence of the stories beneath being on fire, the mother ascended to the roof, carrying her children with her. Here, tying one of he babes to her shoulders, she boldly leaped across an alley six feet in width to the roof of another building, from whence, leaving her burden, she returned, and in like manner carried over in safety each of the others. The act was witnessed by a large concourse of spectators. The mother was in feeble health, and nothing but maternal love could have carried her through so trying a scene.

Well Watched.—The Hudson River Railroad, 150 miles in length, employs 225 "flag men," stationed at intervals along the whole length of the line. Just before a train is to pass, each one walks over his "beat," and looks to see that every track and tie, every tunnel, switch, rail, clamp and rivet is in good order and free from obstruction. If so, he takes his stand with a white flag and waves it to the approaching train, as a signal to "come on"—and come on it does, at full speed. If there is any thing wrong, he waves a red flag, or at night a red lamp, and the engineer on seeing it promptly shuts off the steam, and sounds the whistle to "put down the brakes." Every inch of the road is carefully examined after the passage of each train.

A new and powerful steamer of 600 tuns burden has been constructed at Collyer's yard, in this City, for Messrs. Russell Sturgis, J. N. Griswold, and others, to run as a tow and passenger boat between the ports of Shanghae, Hong Kong, Whampoa, and Canton. She has very appropriately been named the Confucius, after the great Chinese philosopher. The Confucius is expected to leave this port under command of Capt. Dearborne, one of her owners, who will take his family with him. She will go out loaded with coal, viâ the Cape of Good Hope and Singapore.

The U. S. Mint at Philadelphia is now engaged night and day in striking off the new silver coinage. The denominations are three, five, ten, and twenty-five cents. The new quarter of a dollar weighs precisely four pennyweights, and is 7 1-8 grains less than the former piece. As compared with the current Spanish quarters, the new coin is decidedly heavier and somewhat finer.

SUMMARY.

The Chicago Democrat mentions an important decision by the Supreme Court of Illinois, in the case of the Alton and Sangamon Railroad Company vs. Carpenter, in regard to the proper measure of damages for the right of way over private lands. The Court held that, in estimating damage done to land by the construction of a railroad, the advantages which the land will derive from its construction are to be taken into consideration, and vant ducted; and that the estimation of these adpeculia is not to be confined to the advantages creased to the tract of land, but also the inother land, the land bears in common with road was not and what it would bear if the ed at all. If this structed, or to be constructor greater than the creased value is equal to damage can be assessed damage done, then no en for the appropriation compensation givthe land.

We have a report that war gun between Honduras and actually bethough not on a very grand scale. Guatemala, that one hundred and fifty Hondurans said fought and flogged five hundred Guatave eans. The origin of the difficulty is th Some Guatemalean insurgents had taken refuge in Honduras territory, whither they were pursued by Guatamalean forces, who did great damage to the country traversed by their incursion. Failing to obtain indemnity by negotiation, Honduras determined to employ the last argument, and sent out an army of some three thousand men under Gen. Cabañas, while Guatemala marched under Gen. Carera, her foremost military chief.

Wm. Mills writes a communication to the Xenia (O.) Torch Light, in which he says the work on the new College buildings, Antioch, is progressing rapidly. Two and a half millions of brick have been laid, and much progress has been made in other departments. There is a surface equal to eight acres to be plastered. October 1st is the time fixed for opening the school. Hon. Horace Mann and an able corps of teachers have been secured. Both sexes will have the benefit of the course of study. A large number of houses have been built, and the village and vicinity are rapidly filling up with an intelligent population, desirous of availing themselves of the advantages of the locality.

The Providence Post says that an action against the Dorchester and Milton Bank has been decided in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. The suit was brought to recover the value of a $50 bill, which the bank alledged to have been stolen, and thereupon refused payment. The Court said that, in the case of stolen promissory notes and bills of exchange, the party seeking payment for them must prove that he paid value for them or came honestly by them; but in the case of stolen bank bills, the burden of proof is on the other party, and the defendants, to avoid payment, must show that the plaintiffs did not come honestly by them.

The Alton (Ill.) Courier proves by actual statistics that the negro population in Southern Illinois is decreasing. Drawing a line through the center of Sangamon County, and taking all of the counties south of that line, it is proved by a comparison of the census of 1845 with that of 1850, that while in some counties there has been an increase of this class of inhabitants, in others, constituting a majority, there has been a large decrease, amounting in the aggregate to 124. The whole negro population in this part of the State is said to be 640. The Courier argues from this that all alarm about the increase of free negroes is unfounded.

By recent scientific researches on the part of Peter A. Brone, Esq., of Pennsylvania, it has been established that the United States can outrival the world in wool as in cotton. Thus, Spanish sheep yielding naturally wool 2,000 to the inch, carried to England, degenerated to 900 to the inch, and brought to the United States recovered to 2,100, or finer than the original. The fact being once established, that our soil and climate produce finer wool than other countries, will give to our manufacturers invariably the superiority in cloths, if the manufacturer is allied in his interest to the grower.

In the town of Colchester, Delaware County, there resides a veteran of the American Revolution, aged 102 years on the 26th of December last, by the name of William Holliday. He yet retains his mental faculties, and his memory is very tenacious of the events of his youth. He was once taken by the British troops, court martialed, sentenced, and the halter placed about his neck, and then was offered pardon on condition of enlisting in the English service, which he accepted. He deserted the first opportunity, and again joined the Americans.

Thompson's Reporter says: The stringency in the money market has caused a very essena few days are not very reliable—for, should tial decline in Land Warrants. The books for the railroad between Camden and Cape May were opened on Wednesday, and so much stock taken that the Company was organized and a Board of Directors was chosen. This road will open quite a large section of West Jersey to the Philadelphia market. It will also add to the importance of Cape May as a sea-bathing resort.

We are informed, says the Sandy Hill (Washington Co.) Herald, that an extensive publishing house in this State has offered Northrup, the kidnapped slave, recently returned to that village, $3,000 for the copyright of his book, which is now being prepared by a member of the bar of that county.

A shocking steamboat explosion took place in Galveston Bay, on the night of March 23d. It arose from racing. The captain of the boat, the clerk, and the assistant engineer, were among the killed. But the temerity of the officers launched thirteen of the crew and about twenty passengers into eternity along with themselves.

The American Railway Times of the 24th ultimo, contains a table of the Railways of Massachusetts, compiled for that journal by that diligent railway statistician, David M. Balfour, Esq. Massachusetts has one mile of railway for each seven square miles of its geographical surface—a ratio greater than that of any other State of the Union.

Prince's Fountain Pen is the latest novelty that has appeared in the shape of an ink-applier. It requires to be charged but once a day, (of course less frequently with those who write slowly, or less than half the time,) but writes smoothly and easily, and does not soil the fingers—a great point.

DIED.

In Richburgh, Allegany Co., N. Y., March 22, 1853, Bro John Scott, aged 76 years. Bro. Scott was born in New Hampshire, 1777; and when about 20 years of age, he experienced religion and united with the Baptist church. He moved from New Hampshire to Chenango Co., in this State; he next moved to Genesee Co. While living there, he was requested by a young man to prove Sunday-keeping from the Bible. After reading the New Testament through three times, without finding any satisfactory evidence for keeping the first day of the week, he was convinced that the seventh and not the first day of the week was the Sabbath of the Bible. He next moved to Allegany Co., where he became acquainted with the Seventh-day Baptists, and being of their sentiment in his judgment, he felt it to be his duty to observe the Sabbath; and according to his faith, he united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Wirt, about 25 years ago. Bro. Scott was strong in body and mind, and did his part of bringing the wilderness into cultivated fields. He was a warm advocate of the Christian religion, and a firm defender of the Lord's Sabbath. For a few years past his health gradually failed. His last sickness of five days was very severe, but his confidence in God was not shaken. When asked how he felt in his mind, he said, "I remain the same—I leave all with God." We trust he has gone to admire that Saviour by whom he hoped to be saved. He has left a widow and numerous family to mourn his death, but we hope their loss is his gain. L. A.

At Centerville, St. Josephs Co., Mich., on the 27th of February last, Mr. John Richards, aged 58 years. The deceased was a man of exemplary character, and a devoted Christian. By his death many hearts are made to mourn, but they find joy in the promises of God to those who keep his commandments. His memory will be cherished, and we trust his counsels and examples will be heeded, by those who were blessed with their hallowed influence. A. S. B.

At the residence of Eld. L. A. Davis, near Farmington, Ill., on the 7th of March, 1853, Lydia Maxson, widow of the late Deacon Simeon Maxson, in the 83d year of her age. Mother Maxson made profession of religion in early life. She first united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Squam River, in the State of New Jersey, and was subsequently a member of the following churches: New Salem, Va, Pike, Northampton, and Port Jefferson, Ohio. Of the last she was a member when she died.

At the residence of Dea. Job Vanhorn, March 7, 1853, Joshua Hill, son of Job and Prudence Vanhorn, aged 6 years, 11 months, and 7 days.

At the same place, on the 11th of the same month, Mary, daughter of Job and Prudence Vanhorn, aged 12 years, 4 months, and 12 days. Funeral discourse by Eld. Joshua Hill, from Job 14: 14—"If a man die, shall he live again?"

Extract of a Letter from Hon. Wm. Jay to the Author.
"Your analysis of the slave laws is very able, and your exhibition of their practical application by the Southern Courts, evinces great and careful research." "Your book is as impregnable against the charge of exaggeration as Euclid's Geometry, since, like that, it consists of propositions and demonstrations. The book is not only true, but it is unquestionably true."

Miscellaneous.

Bridging the St. Lawrence.

The magnificent project of spanning the St. Lawrence river by a tubular bridge, similar to that erected over the Menai Straits, by Stephenson, is likely to be one of the triumphs of modern science and mechanics. The following particulars in relation to the proposed bridge, are furnished by a Canadian paper:

The bridge, it is calculated, will cost £1,250,000; its greatest span, over the deep channel of the river, is to be 360 feet in length, and the carriage-way will be 100 feet above high water level. As the far famed Britannia bridge, over the Menai Straits, consisting of four spans—two in the center being 460 feet each in length, and those next the shores 230 feet each—its carriage-way being 102 feet above the high water line, only cost £601,865, we take it for granted the much increased estimated cost of the proposed bridge across the St. Lawrence is attributable to the great expense of constructing, over the land and shallow water, the approaches to what may be called the bridge proper.

It will be observed that the Britannia bridge, from land to land, is only 1380 feet in length—or little over a quarter of a mile—while the St. Lawrence, opposite Montreal, is nowhere less than two miles, from shore to shore.

Spring the Murderer.

The following chapter in the life of Arthur Spring, the man recently convicted of murder in Philadelphia, shows the gradual progress of a bad man to an awful end.

Now that Arthur Spring, the late trial of whom for murder has excited so much interest, is convicted, and nothing remains but to execute the fearful penalty, it will not be improper, and may not be uninteresting, to recite a brief chapter of the last five or six years of his life.

Spring was an Irishman born—a confectioner by trade; he lived for a number of years and up to 1844–'5 in the City of Philadelphia, after which he moved his family to this City, and commenced the business of a refectory and liquor saloon in a basement two or three doors from the old Park Theater. Within three months after he had opened this "place" in Park Row, he was arrested by the Police on a charge of having, in connection with another person, (still residing in New York,) enticed a sailor (the mate, we think,) of a vessel, into his cellar at a late hour at night, knocked him down with a heavy club of wood, wounding him nearly to death, and robbed him of $600 in gold coin. The evidence against Spring was not conclusive of guilt, but was sufficient to bind him in the sum of $1,000 to appear and answer the charge. He procured bail, and was released from the Tombs.

Spring's family lived in some rooms in the rear of his place of business, and soon after this charge against him, his wife died in childbirth, (as it was said, but otherwise, as it was suspected,) leaving three small children, the eldest a son—the present witness on the trial for murder—and two infant girls. In less than a month after the first charge, and within a few days after the death of his wife, Spring was again apprehended on a charge of having stolen, at night, in his cellar (and almost in the same manner the mate was robbed,) $200 and over from an emigrant lately arrived in this City. A part of the money was found concealed under the steps of the stoop leading into his rear yard. The offense was fixed upon him almost beyond doubt. After his arrest he confessed his guilt to Justice Stuart, admitting also the perpetration of the other robbery—how it was done—who was concerned with him in the felony—in what manner they divided the money, and where he had concealed most of his share, (which on searching proved true,) declaring most solemnly, that he had committed the second offense for the sole purpose of getting a sufficient amount of money to re-imburse the party first robbed, (his partner in the crime refusing to surrender back any portion of his share,) so that the seaman might, as he had promised, leave the city and not appear against him at the trial, and he be thereby preserved from the State prison, and saved to the care and protection of his children. Spring pleaded guilty to the second offense, and was sentenced six years to a felon's doom—hard labor at Sing Sing—leaving his destitute and worse than orphan children friendless and without protection. Mr. Stuart had them placed in the kind charge of Mrs. Foster, matron of the City Prison, where they remained for a number of weeks, and were finally removed to the Alms House.

Some six or ten months after, it was learned that the wife of Spring had some relations, and among them an aunt, owner of some property, at or near Washington. On writing to her, Stuart received an answer that if the children could be sent on to Washington, proper charge would be taken of them by their mother's relatives. A small amount of money was raised, a trusty person employed, and these poor children—young Arthur, with two smaller sisters—were forwarded to their friends and kindred.

Five years passed, when one morning in the early part of December last, Arthur—a bright, intelligent lad, who had passed to the age of sixteen or seventeen years—presented himself to Justice Stuart (who was at once reminded of the unhappy history of father and family) stating that he was living an apprentice to a confectioner in Washington—that his sisters were both alive and with their friends—that he had come on alone to New York to see if, by some means, he could not get his father pardoned the remaining year of his sentence from the State Prison—that he would have made the effort sooner, but was without money to pay his passage from Washington, and had only then become enabled, by a long and continuous saving of all the small means he could husband. The magistrate, moved by the noble object of the boy, (who declared that nothing would make him so happy as to be able to take his father home with him to his little sisters,) and upon his own knowledge of the whole matter, wrote an earnest letter to Governor Hunt, with which the lad proceeded to Albany. It is almost needless to say, that with a man like Governor Hunt, the brave and generous conduct, and earnest, artless pleading of this manly and devoted stranger boy, for the pardon of a parent so long confined in the dungeon of the State, did not fail of its object. The freed father and thankful child, with hearts swollen by emotions of gratitude, and bounding with hope in the joyful anticipation of restoring a long lost parent to the little sisters he so much loved, with no delay, left New York by the way of Philadelphia for the City of Washington.

The rest is known. And this is the son on whom the father seeks to fix the offense of a most diabolical murder, of which he alone is, beyond doubt, the perpetrator, and most righteously convicted.

The Varnish Tree.

Few who are in the habit of either using or seeing the beautiful black Japan Varnish, which is so much admired for the elegant gloss it imparts, know whence it is obtained, or are familiar with the manner in which it is procured, and the unpleasant exposure attending the operation. It is the product of a tree which grows wild both in China and Japan. It is cultivated in plantations, and is so much improved by the treatment it receives, that a cultivated tree yields three times as much varnish as a wild one. The Chinese call the tree "Tsi Shoo;" it has some resemblance to the ash, with leaves shaped like those of the laurel, of a light green color and downy feeling. There is scarcely any thing more curious about the trees than the common manner of propagating, which is neither by seeds nor suckers. Early in the spring a small branch or twig is selected, about a foot and a half or two feet in length, and a ring of bark cut from it all round, about half an inch in breadth. The wound is immediately coated up with soft clay, and a ball of the same clay formed around five or six inches in diameter. This is then covered up with matting to prevent it from falling to pieces, and a vessel of water hung over with a very minute hole in the under part, sufficient to admit the water to drop slowly upon the ball and keep it constantly moist. In the course of six months, with this treatment, the wounded edges of the bark shoot forth into the fibre-like roots, which form the more readily as the tree is still supported by the sap from the parent stock. When the twig has taken sufficient root in the mass of the clay to support an independent existence, it is cut from the tree a little below the clay, placed immediately in the earth, and at once becomes a self-sustaining tree.

When these trees are seven or eight years old, they are capable of supplying the varnish, which is gathered in the following manner:—About the middle of summer the laborers proceed to the plantations of the varnish tree, each furnished with a crooked knife and a large number of hollow shells, somewhat larger than oyster shells. With their knives they make numerous incisions in the bark of the trees, about two inches in length, and under each incision they force in the edge of the shell, which easily penetrates the soft bark and remains in the tree. This operation is performed in the evening, as the varnish flows only in the night. The next morning the workmen revisit the trees, and find each shell either wholly or partially filled with varnish, which they scrape out carfully with their knives, depositing it in a vessel which they carry with them, and throw the shells into a basket at the foot of the tree. In the evening the shells are replaced, and the varnish again collected in the morning. This process is continued throughout the summer, or until the varnish ceases to flow. It is computed that fifty trees, which can be attended by a single workman, will yield a pound of varnish every night. When the gathering is over, the varnish is strained through a thin cloth, loosely placed over an earthen vessel, and the little impurity that remains is used in physic. The natural color of the varnish is white, and it looks like cream, but it blackens on exposure to the air.

There is a corrosive property in the varnish, which operates very injuriously to the workmen employed in the preparation of it, if the utmost care and precaution is not taken to avoid its distressing effect. A kind of tetter appears on the face, and in the course of a few days spreads over the whole body; the skin becomes red and painful, the head swells, and the whole surface of the body is covered with troublesome sores. To prevent these effects the workmen rub their bodies well with prepared oil, before they proceed to their work; they wash themselves with a decoction of herbs and bark, and prepare themselves by a course of medicine. In addition to these precautions they wrap their heads in linen veils whenever they are at work, leaving only two holes for the eyes; and also cover themselves with a close dress of leather, and wear long gloves reaching above the elbows. By these means they are enabled to escape the diseases generated by the noxious vapors of the varnish tree. [Jour.

Jefferson's Homestead.

"Old Hundred" writes to the Vincennes Gazette an account of a recent visit to Monticello, the homestead of Jefferson. Here is a passage from his letter:—

"The estate is now in the possession of a naval officer, who makes it his summer residence. We found on the first floor a Bust of Jefferson, a Portrait of Lafayette, one of Washington, and a couple of miniature 'Hard Cider' barrels, with 'Whig principles' written on them. The estate is in a very dilapidated condition. The stone fences are falling down. But a small portion of the soil is cultivated, the gardens bloom no more, and the ivy clings but timidly to the walls. Mr. Jefferson had some queer notions concerning his domestic matters. He had subterranean passages constructed, leading from his house to the quarters of the servants, so that they could carry on their work and still not be seen by the guests. Among other things, he built a 'wind mill' on a high elevation, (so my friend informed me, who knew him well, and was acquainted with all his peculiarities,) but after its completion, having spent a considerable amount of money in its erection, the question was proposed to him by his Mill Wright, "how in the world were the logs to be raised to such a hight?" This was a poser to Mr. Jefferson; the mill worked admirably, but there was no way to get the material to it to work on, and so the project failed, and portions of the 'old mill' still stand as a monument of his folly."

New Form of Slave Trade.—A Canada letter-writer says that a most extraordinary circumstance took place a short time ago, in the way of trading in human flesh by parties in Canada. A man named Smith, residing in the township of Trafalgar, entered into a speculation with two young negroes. The agreement was, that they should go South; that Smith should dispose of his partners in the speculation in the slave market; they relying on their ability to escape from the servitude into which they were to allow themselves to be fradulently sold; after which the booty was to be the common plunder of the three. This arrangement was no sham; for the journey was undertaken and the sale actually made; but the escape has yet to be heard of. A kindred case of baser hue has come to light. A free negro recently came here to take a wife of his own color. The girl's father was reputed to possess, and does possess, considerable property. He gave the daughter in marriage, but, like a prudent man, kept his cash. This did not suit the matrimonial speculator—for such the fellow proved to be—and he resolved to make something out of the match. He took his bride to the slave shambles, sold her, and, putting the proceeds into his pocket, went along his way. The father has left in search of a daughter whom he regards as of inestimable value.

Statistics of Drunkenness in England.

A parliamentary paper has been published in return to a motion made by Mr. Hume, showing the number of persons taken into custody for drunkenness and for disorderly conduct by the metropolitan police force, with similar returns relating to the city of London, and to the cities of Edinburg and Glasgow. This interesting paper throws a favorable light on the progress of sobriety and good conduct in the various districts of London. In 1831, when the metropolitan population amounted to 1,515,585, there were 81,353 persons arrested for drunkenness, and 10,383 for disorderly conduct; of the drunkards, 11,605 were women, and 10,748 were men; among the persons who conducted themselves in a disorderly manner there were 7,287 women, and 3,096 men. In 1841, when the population had increased to 2,068,107, the numbers of the same offenses were still enormous, the total for drunkenness being 15,006, and for disorderly conduct 15,810; there were among these totals 5,123 female drunkards and 9,883 males, and among the disorderly there were 7,913 women and 7,897 men. In the same year the city police took up 2,313 persons for drunkenness and 802 persons for disorderly conduct, among a population, as shown by the census returns, of 123,563 persons. In 1851, when the population of the metropolitan districts had increased to 2,399,004, the total number of persons arrested for drunkenness had decreased to 10,668, 6,207 of whom were men and 3,762 women. In the city the numbers were, in 1851, drunkards arrested, 280; disorderly persons arrested, 681. Edinburgh, with 140,000 inhabitants, in 1841, shows 4,824 arrests for drunkenness and disorderly conduct in that year, and in 1851, when the population was 166,000, the arrests were only 2,793; while Glasgow, with 333,651 inhabitants, in 1851, had, in that year, 10,122 arrests for the reasons mentioned above.

The Whale Fishery.

Capt. Penny, the eminent arctic navigator, has at length succeeded in forming a company for the purpose of carrying on whale and other fisheries, and founding a permanent settlement in the arctic regions—a scheme which has occupied his attention for a great number of years. The objects of this company are the application of the powers of the auxiliary screw to whaling vessels, the establishment of fishing settlements in the bays and inlets of Davis' Straits, and especially of founding a fishing and mining colony in an inlet known as Northumberland Inlet, or Hogarth Sound, discovered by Capt. Penny, on the shores of which there is great mineral wealth, and where the whales hunted from the other fishing grounds find refuge, and especially abound during the spring months, when the ice in Davis' Straits effectually prevents any vessel from approaching the coasts. The intended settlement lies in the same latitude as Archangel, and in a region in which the mineral wealth is known to be very great, especially in plumbago, a product almost worked out in England, and of great value.

The company propose sending two new screw steam whalers, of 500 tuns each, in the spring months, to the seas between Greenland and Nova Zembla, a region to which Mr. Petermann has so often drawn attention. Later in the year the steamers would start for Hogarth Sound, so as to arrive there before August. They would there remain until the ice forms in November, when they would return with the produce of the fishing up to that time, leaving the settlers to prosecute the inshore fishery, and store up the produce until the return of the steamers in the following year. This scheme promises well. Energetic measures are indeed much needed to raise the British whale fisheries to their former importance, and to the same importance in which they have been carried on by the Americans for some time. We hope yet to see the steamers of this company fish in the Great Polar sea to the north of Asia, and right under the Pole itself, if, as is generally believed, the sea extends to that point. [Lit. A Peep at Guano where it is Gathered.

Having anchored between the north and middle islands, at the latter of which we are to load, we will borrow the boat and have a closer look at the huge muck heap. Pulling half round the island to the landing place, we step ashore on a narrow slip of sandy beach, which appears to be cleared from the surrounding rocks for our special convenience. Our appearance disturbs thousands of the web-footed natives; these thousands count with the old hands as nothing, for they tell us that the shipping has driven all the birds away. Sailing above us is a flock of pelicans, hovering over the clear water like hawks, which they resemble in their mode of darting down or stooping on their prey. One of these every instant drops from the flock as though a ball had whistled through his brain, but after a plunge, he is soon seen rising to the surface, with a fish struggling in his capacious pouch. Nearer to us, whirling round our heads, are gannets, mews, mutton-birds, and a host of others whose names are unknown to the vulgar. On the detached rocks and the lower edge of the island—member of a pretty numerous convocation—stands the penguin, the parson-bird of the sailor, whose good name is fairly earned by his cut-away black coat, white tie, and solemn demeanor; his short legs planted far back, and his long body, do not fit him for a walk ashore; but he will sit for hours on a little rock just washed by the waves, apparently in such deep absence of mind that passers-by are tempted to approach in hope of catching him. Just as the boat nears him, and a hand is already stretched out to grasp his neck, away he goes head over heels in a most irreverent and ridiculous manner, dives under the boat and shows his head again about a quarter of a mile out at sea, where the sailor may catch him who can, for he is the fastest swimmer and the best diver that ever dipped.

Stepping over the mortal remains of several sea-lions, in a few strides we are on the guano, and at the next step in it up to our knees. The guano is regularly stratified; the lower strata are solidified by the weight of the upper, and have acquired a dark red color, which becomes gradually lighter towards the surface. On the surface, it has a whitey-brown light crust, very well baked by the sun; it is a crust containing eggs, being completely honey-combed by the birds, which scratch deep, oblique holes, in it to serve as nests, wherein eggs, seldom more than two to each nest, are deposited. These holes, often running into each other, form long galleries, with several entrances, and this mining system is so elaborately carried out, that you can scarcely put a foot on any part of the islands without sinking to the knee and being tickled with the sense of a hard beak digging into your unprotected ancles. The egg shells and the bones and remains of fish brought by the old birds for their young, must form a considerable part of the substance of the guano, which is thus in a great measure deposited beneath the surface, and then thrown out by the birds.

The First Saw Mill.

The old practice in making boards was to split the logs with wedges, and inconvenient as the practice was, it was no easy thing to persuade the world that it could be done in any better way. Saws were afterwards introduced for the purpose of preparing timber and boards, and "saw pits" were then invented for the action of the two-handed saw. This mode of sawing logs was greatly in use in New England, where water power could not easily be obtained, in the early part of the present century—and probably there are places yet, where they are known and render useful service. Saw mills were first used in Europe in the 15th century; but so lately as 1555, an English ambassador, having seen a saw mill in France, thought it a novelty which deserved a particular description. It is amusing to see how the aversion to labor-saving machinery has always agitated England. The first saw mill was established by a Dutchman, in 1663; but the public outcry against the new-fangled machine was so violent, that the proprietor was forced to decamp with more expedition than ever did a Dutchman before. The evil was thus kept out of England for several years, or rather generations; but in 1798, an unlucky timber merchant, hoping that after so long a time the public would be less watchful of its own interest, made a rash attempt to construct another mill. The guardians of the public welfare, however, were on the alert, and a conscientious mob at once collected and pulled the mill to pieces. Such patriotic spirit could not always last, and now, though we have nowhere seen the fact distinctly stated, there is reason to believe that saw mills are used in England, propelled both by water and steam power.—Boston Jour.

Statistics and Uses of Gutta Percha.

The tree from which it is obtained—and there is but one—grows scarcely anywhere but in the Malayan Archipelago, and that until Dr. Montgomerie noticed that the native used it in 1842, and together with Dr. D'Almeida forced it upon the attention of the London manufacturers in 1843, it was unknown here. In 1845 we imported only 20,600 pounds, but in 1848 the quantity brought in amouuted to 3,000,000 pounds, and since then it has been constantly increasing, and, if it can be had, will continue to increase. Even now we see it in use in the shape of mill bands, buckets, sailors' hats, buoys, speaking trumpets, tables, baskets, picture frames, moulded decorations of all sorts, pumps and bottles for acids, pipes for water and gas, soles for boots, hats, snuff boxes, whips, skate bottoms, breasts for water wheels, and a hundred other things. And these we are satisfied, are nothing compared with the uses to which it will be applied hereafter. In fact, you may make anything of it but bread and cheese, and even of these you could get from it such an imitation as would serve the eye, though the gastric juice would find it difficult to work upon. The mode of obtaining gutta percha, we may say here, is most wasteful; instead of tapping the trees at intervals to obtain the sap, the trees are cut down, so that, unless their artificial cultivation be taken up by civilized people, the supply will soon be shortened. Dr. Oxley, who wrote in Singapore, whence all we get at present comes, says, that for the quantity which was exported between January 2, 1842, and July, 1847, nearly 70,000 trees must have been destroyed.

A Fact (if it be a Fact) for Hydropathists.—The Hollidaysburg (Pa.) Standard tells the following hard story:—

"Two or three weeks ago, a respectable married woman, residing in the eastern end of this county, gave birth to twin children, which addition increased the little responsibilities of the household to nine. Some five or six nights after this event, the husband, who occupied a bed in the same room, was awakened by her, when she complained bitterly of her hard lot in having such a large household to care for. The husband soothed her as well as he could, and then fell asleep. In about an hour he awoke, and found that his wife had left her bed. Immediate search was made in and around the house, but the woman was not to be found. The alarmed man, fearing that, in her weak condition, she must perish before she could go far, summoned his neighbors to aid in searching for her. The party soon discovered foot-prints in the snow, and they followed the track to a creek, where she had crossed and re-crossed the stream three times, in water to the depth of three feet. From there they tracked her along the creek, through fields and woods, for a distance of nearly three miles, and at length found her sitting in a fence corner, with a piece of rope and a nail in her hand. When interrogated as to her motive for leaving her home, she declared it was her intention to commit suicide. It was then suggested, that she was laboring under aberration of mind, which she undoubtedly was, but this she stoutly denied. The strange part of this occurrence is, that the woman, after walking barefooted, and with nothing on her but thin cotton night clothes, a distance of three or four miles, through snow, slush, and cold water, and that, too, only six days after giving birth to two children, is now as well as ever she was in her life. This may appear strange, especially to medical men, nevertheless it is true."

Jewelry Manufacture.—The manufacture of Jewelry is carried on in New York, to a large extent. It is estimated by one of those most largely engaged in the business, that the annual product amounts to $3,000,000. There are seventeen houses engaged in it on a large scale, and twice as many small manufacturers. One of the former is understood to do a business amounting to $500,000 per annum; and the average number of men employed by each is 60 or 70. Two, at least, employ about 150 men each. These men are mostly Germans, though there are many French and Americans. The latter, with suitable advantages, are considered quite as skillful as any. The wages given range from $10 to $18 per week. Some earn from $20 to $25; and a few have been known to get $30 per week. Gold sovereigns are chiefly used, though refined gold from the bullion offices is worked to a considerable extent. Some manufacturers consume $2,500 worth every week.

Trees of Oregon.—In the March number of Barry's Horticulturist, published at Rochester, is a communication from N. Coe, of Portland, Oregon, furnishing accounts of the dimensions of several trees of remarkable size which he measured in that Territory; one of these trees, near Astoria, being 10 feet in diameter, five feet above the ground, 112 feet to the first limb, and its total height 242 feet. Another one, in a forest of spruce, cedar, and fir, of about the same size, measured thirty-nine feet in circumference. Mr. Coe says: "Gen. John Adair, of Astoria, informs me that about three years ago he bought a hundred thousand shingles, all made from one cedar tree, for which he gave fifteen hundred dollars in gold." The tremendous size of timber in Oregon appears to be well attested.

El Paraguay.—Such is the name of a new steamer which recently cleared from New York for the Republic of Paraguay, a destination, it is said, never before had by any vessel sailing from Europe or North America. She goes for the purpose of carrying on a regular trade on the Rio de La Plata and the Paraguay rivers, between Montevideo and Assuncion, a distance of eleven hundred miles, never yet traversed by steam craft of any description. She will perform a regular monthly trip between the two cities, carrying passengers and freight, and will be the means of opening a commercial communication—which has never yet existed—with all the tributaries of the Rio de La Plata, comprising an extent of three hundred thousand square leagues of territory, rich in articles of commercial exchange. VARIETY.

A novel discovery has recently been made in England, which is likely to effect a revolution in the milk trade. In consequence of the advance in the price of olive oil, from £40 per ton to £70, the manufacturers of woollen cloths, who use this oil in large quantities, have found out that necessity is the mother of invention. One of them, in the neighborhood of Thurstone, near Penistone, tried whether milk mixed with oil would not answer the purpose. The experiment exceeded his most sanguine expectations, the mixture being far better for the purpose than olive oil alone. The consequence has been, that milk has advanced 1s. 4d. per gallon in the neighborhood of some of the woollen cloth mills, and cows are being bought up in all directions.

Bishop Butler, when on his death-bed, having sent for his chaplain, observed that, though he had endeavored to avoid sin and please God, yet from the consciousness which he felt of perpetual infirmities, he was still afraid to die. "My Lord," said the chaplain, "you have forgotten that Jesus Christ is a Saviour!" "True," replied the Bishop, "but how shall I know that He is a Saviour for me?" "My Lord, it is written, 'Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out.'" "True," responded the worthy prelate, with admiration, 'and I am surprised, that, though I have read the passage a thousand times over, I never felt its virtue till this moment, and now I die happy.'

The celebrated Sheridan was one day much annoyed by a fellow-member of the House of Commons, who kept crying out every few minutes, "Hear! hear!" During the debate he took occasion to describe a political cotemporary that wished to play rouge, but had only sense enough to act a fool. "Where," exclaimed he, with great emphasis, "where shall we find a more foolish knave or a more knavish fool than he?" "Hear! hear!" was shouted by the troublesome member. Sheridan turned round, and, thanking him for the prompt reply, sat down amid a general roar of laughter.

J. R. Gliddon relates in his lecture on Egyptian Archæology, reported in his Archæological Journal, of the past and present month, that "an Arab discovered the northern air channel of the Great Pyramid to be opened from top to bottom, by placing a cat at the outer orifice and her kittens at the other, shutting them in with stones. The mother soon found her way down through the pyramid to her little family, thus proving that this hitherto mysterious passage communicated with the outside. Previous to the clearing of these passages, the air in the pyramid was quite suffocating."

Can any of our readers interpret it? At first we took it for apothecaries' Latin; judge our surprise when the key was given to us, to find the above inscrutable items were simply these—"A horse half a day," and "a taking him home again."

A fine stone church was lately built in Missouri, upon the facade of which a stone-cutter was ordered to cut the following as an inscription:—"My house shall be called the house of prayer." He was referred for accuracy to the verse of scripture in which these words occur, but unfortunately he transcribed, to the scandal of the society, the whole verse:—"My house shall be called the house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves!"

Remember, ye who ridicule a young man for his parsimony, and stigmatize him as "small," that by and by he can afford to be generous when you have nothing to give.

ASKING AND NOT RECEIVING.

Published by special request.

"Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts." James 4: 3.

As we are creatures dependent for the blessings we enjoy, it becomes us to inquire into the origin and existence of those "lusts" that "war against the soul," and prevent our receiving a favorable answer when we ask our Heavenly Father for such things as we think we stand in need of, to enable us to perform our duty, not only to him, but to ourselves and each other.

That there are at times prayers tinctured with "lust," I have no doubt; but there are certainly others in which it is not so visible, at least to human eyes. I will mention one. In a time of revival the mind of a beloved sister became clouded and desponding, bordering on despair. The brethren and sisters labored with her and for her, and most fervently too, but with no results favorable to her case. A meeting was appointed especially on her account, to be devoted to prayer for her deliverance. The meeting was well attended, and earnestly and devoutly conducted, but no deliverance. She is still living, and much given to desponding fears, though thirty years and more have since been added to her life. I have never been able to discover any lurking place in such a case for "lust." Can any one help me?

On the other hand, when we pray God to prosper our army and navy, and give us victory over our enemies, (if we have any,) I can more easily discover the appearance of "lust." "From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts, that war in your members." War not being a gospel requirement, we are not to expect God's blessing in prosecuting it; yet in every army or regiment throughout Christendom, we see ministers of the gospel acting as chaplains, and praying earnestly for victory. While they know full well, that two opposing armies cannot both be victorious, of course they must have faint hopes of a favorable answer to their petitions.

Again, "lust" may appear in our prayers when we ask for rain in a time of severe drouth; yet I have heard many fervent prayers for rain, and have known churches to appoint a day of fasting and prayer to obtain it. I believe, however, that they had to wait the regular course of God's providence before they obtained it. And here I must say, that I have never discovered any special interposition of Divine Providence in answer to such a request. It may be that this, as in the case of war, is unreasonable, not only on account of its tendency to gratify our "lusts," but on account of the conflicting interests of individuals. Agriculturists may plead for rain, but a salt-maker would not be apt to join in such a petition.

Again, I should not expect a favorable answer to our prayers for the conversion and restoration of the Jews, not so much on account of any particular gratification of our "lusts," but as being contrary to the mind and will of God; because I believe the Jews were set apart from all the rest of mankind for a great and glorious purpose, and I do not believe the time for the completion of the grand design has yet arrived, as God has not named the period when, nor the agencies by which, the result is to be brought about. As to the time, Christ has said, "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." And, again, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, not even the angels, nor the Son, but the Father only." As to the agencies to be employed, I think we are left entirely in the dark. Though we have some intimations of our duty respecting the heathen, and those that know not God, yet I believe there is no duty left on record for us concerning the Jews. A learned commentator says, "There are some things from which the Jews do not need to be converted. They are not heathen, nor idolaters, and do not need to be turned from image worship. They are better in this respect than some called Christians. But they are self-righteous. They have wrong ideas of God's holy law, and of God himself; for his amazing gift of a free forgiveness is too magnificent for them to receive." I have often thought that if the Jews were as well concentrated and prepared for action as the Christians, there would be as much propriety in their sending missionaries to the Christians, as for the Christians to send to them; and I have no doubt that, with the same exertions and amount of money expended, the majority of converts would be much in their favor.

I have no knowledge, neither do I suppose it attainable, how long it has been a custom for those calling themselves Christians to pray for the restoration and conversion of the Jews; but certainly more than fifty years have elapsed since I have been a witness to the custom, and I know not but it has continued ever since their dispersion. And what has been the result? About thirty years ago, a Society was formed for meliorating the condition of the Jews, which has been in operation ever since, and I see by the returns of that Society for the past year, that they have gained seven converts, at an expense of more than three thousand dollars each. Now, whether they calculate to continue their exertions till their minds are answered, I cannot say; but whatever may be their determination, I have no doubt that when the decree went forth for the dispersion of the Jews, and the prophets proclaimed it to a listening world, the time was irrevocably fixed to a certain period for their return or restoration, and that to all the prayers and exertions that may be made in Christendom, the final answer will be, "Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss."

My views on this subject, I think, can be illustrated by a sketch of my experience in the early part of my life. When I was at the age of about sixteen or seventeen years, and somewhat engaged to know whom I would serve, a friend (at least I thought him so) lent me Paine's "Age of Reason," which I read very carefully, contrary to the advice of some of my better friends. The consequence was, that I became quite an advocate for infidelity. Fortunately, however, at that juncture of time, another of my better friends sent me Watson's "Reply," which I likewise read with (as I thought) the same desire to arrive at the truth, as I had when I commenced with Paine. But it seems I did not swallow the antidote with the same relish I did the poison, for infidelity maintained the ascendancy, until I came to the prophecies respecting the Jews; and here I was brought to a stand. I finally reasoned thus with myself: These prophecies were delivered, according to history, some hundreds of years before the Christian era; the dispersion has taken place since, likewise according to history. Now suppose the restoration had taken place five hundred or a thousand years ago; that also would now have become a matter of history, which I might believe or not, according to the disposition with which I received the testimony. But it is not so. The Jews stand visibly before me, let me look which way I will. Let me visit any city or nation, and there I meet them, as messengers from God, and I can but exclaim, "Here stand the living witnesses to God's eternal truth." History and the living witnesses agree. God's word is true—I cannot doubt it. I did not doubt it; nor have I ever doubted since. And I have no reason to doubt they will be thus retained till there shall be no longer occasion for any one to say to his neighbor, Know thou the Lord; or, in other words, that the conversion of the heathen and the restoration of the Jews are to be simultaneous. Christ has said, "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." From Isaiah, and Zechariah, and Paul, it is very plain, that Israel's restoration is to be the world's elevation—that Israel's ingathering is to coincide with the world's great harvest-home. Their fall was a blessing to a few Gentile families; their rising will be a blessing to the whole earth.

The command, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel," is being obeyed; and the success of those who have gone forth is truly astonishing. Already have they obtained admission into almost every heathen country on earth, and they are daily progressing in the good work. Japan is an exception, but we have a formidable fleet on the way there, for the purpose of negotiating an interview with their people—in order to open a traffic, and add them to the list of our converts to the Christian religion.

It must not be forgotten, that nearly simultaneously with the first missionary efforts, commenced the first movements of quickening our communication with all the world by steam and lightning, first by steamboats, next railroads, and lastly by telegraph; all favorable to the progress of missionary efforts and the restoration of the Jews to Palestine; and I have no doubt, that they will continue to increase and flourish, until God's purpose, which he had in their construction, is accomplished, and as it has commenced since the beginning of the present century, so I think it will in a great measure be accomplished before the end of it. With the same ratio in the increase of the number of converts to the Christian religion, the work of evangelizing must be accomplished long before that period arrives.

I believe it is not expected that the Jews will be generally converted before the restoration; neither do I think it essential to the case, whether they are or not, as it is possible that the very act of their restoration will be an efficient agent in opening their eyes to see the wisdom of God manifested in their redemption and salvation, and the happy arrival of the time so long desired, not only by themselves, but by every Christian philanthropist on earth, when they should see eye to eye, and their spears should be beat into pruning hooks, and their swords into ploughshares, and the sound and terrors of war should be heard no more.

Some disbelieve, on account of the difficulty of finding means of transportation. But suppose one of those far-seeing mortals could have lived at a time coeval with the creation, would he not have raised the same objection against the creation of the world, by asking where are means or materials to be procured for such a work? But it is sufficient for us to know, that this is not man's but God's work, and I believe, as sure as he has accomplished one, he will the other, and by the same miraculous power, whether the society to which I have referred continue their exertions and petitions or not, as I believe the Jews were as well prepared for the union, when that society was first formed, as they are at the present time, or as they will be at the end of the century, if the union is delayed to that time.

I believe the time is fast approaching; and O what a happy day that will be, when the words of the prophet Zechariah shall be fulfilled: "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, In those days it shall come to pass, that ten men shall take hold, out of all languages of the nations, even shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, we will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you." Well may it be said, "When the Lord turns the captivity of Zion, you will be like them that dream. Your own mouth will be filled with laughter, and it will be said among the Gentiles, the Lord hath done great things for them." Only think what a scene; ten men from different nations hanging to the skirts of a poor, despised, down-trodden Jew, to be conducted to Jerusalem, because, as they say, "God is with you." How changed the scene! How reversed their condition!

I have had an intimate and very friendly acquaintance with several of the leading characters of the Jews, and have conversed freely with them on their present condition and future prospects, and their general sentiment appears to be expressed in one short sentence, viz: "We think we understand our own condition as well as or better than our neighbors; and all we ask of them is, to let us alone; to our own Master we stand or fall." And knowing that they are "not heathen or idolaters," but professed worshipers of the same God as the Christians, why not allow them to be their own judges?

Had I funds at my disposal equal to what has been distributed annually for many years by the societies organized for their benefit, and felt disposed to continue it, I would rather change the direction of it to the Palestine Mission lately established with a view to promote the interests of agriculture in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, which, from present appearances, I think may yet astonish the world—though I admit that it looks at present like a small beginning. But "great trees from little acorns grow." Great things grow from small beginnings. The birth of Christ in a manger was a small beginning for the astonishing results that have followed it—which may teach us not to despise the day of small things. I think the present movements in that neglected and down-trodden region look more like putting the shoulder to the wheel for the benefit of the Jews, than anything that has ever transpired since the dispersion. To me it holds out a prospect that Palestine is about to be reanimated, and Jerusalem repeopled. Why should such a fertile land lie waste for ever? "As it was once a salubrious climate, so it was a fertile land. In its better days it was the garden of the Lord, a land of brooks and water, of fountains and of depths, that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat and barley, and vines and fig trees, and pomegranates; a land of olive and honey; but the long desolations have dried up many of its fountains, and blasted its vines and fig trees." A traveler in Palestine, early in the present century, confirms this description, but adds, "The present management or cultivation is any thing but husbandry. The lazy boor on the sea coast scratches the mould and flings in a handful of melon seeds, and is rewarded with the most delicious produce in the world; but not a plough or hoe or tool proper for farmer's use is to be seen. But let the seed of Jacob people it once more, and its pastures will be clothed with flocks, and its valleys will be covered with corn; and whilst the little hills exult on every side, the people that went forth weeping, will doubtless come again rejoicing, and saying to each other, 'Come, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord together, and to the house of the God of Jacob, and he will teach us his ways, and we will walk in his paths forever.'" JOSEPH STILLMAN.

"LEARN TO LABOR AND TO WAIT."

A boy once shot an arrow in the air. So lofty was its flight, he lost sight of it in the clouds, and failed to detect the place of its descent. Long time he searched in vain around the meadow, and at last went home mourning the loss of his arrow. Years passed away. The boy became a man. After many wanderings, he revisited the haunts of his boyhood. Walking around the meadow, he gazed upon a venerable oak, whose wide spreading branches had frequently sheltered him, in his boyhood, from the rays of the sultry sun. Full of old memories, he stood until his eye rested on a feather which protruded from a hollow in the tree. He drew it forth, and with it the identical arrow which years before he mourned as lost!

It is said of Dr. Coke, that while journeying in America, he once attempted to ford a river. But his horse lost his foothold and was carried down the stream. The Doctor narrowly escaped drowning by clinging to a bough, which overhung the river side. A lady, in the vicinity, gave him entertainment in his distress; sent messengers after his horse; and did him much kindness. When he left her roof, he gave her a tract!

For five years the good Dr. toiled on in the cause of God in England and America. Whether his tract had been destroyed, or had pierced a human heart, he knew not—nay, he had forgotten its gift. But one day, on his way to Conference, a young man approached him, and requested the favor of a brief conversation. "Do you remember, sir, being nearly drowned in ——— river some five years ago?"

"I remember it quite well!" replied the Doctor.

Do you recollect the widow lady, at whose house you were entertained, after escaping from the river?"

"I do, and never shall I forget the kindness she showed me."

"And do you also remember giving her a tract, when you bade her farewell?"

"I do not; but it is very possible I did so."

"Yes sir, you did leave a tract. That lady read it, and was converted. She loaned it to her neighbors, and many of them were converted too. Several of her children were also saved. A society was formed which flourishes to this day."

This statement moved the Dr. to tears. But the young man, after a brief pause, resumed, saying:

"I have not quite told you all; I am her son. That tract led me to Christ. And now, sir, I am on my way to Conference to seek admission as a traveling preacher."

Thus did the good Dr. Coke find his arrow in an unexpected hour! And thus will our shafts come back to us all in due season.

THOUGHTS FOR THE DEPARTED.

Think ever of the dead—
When Spring is beautiful, when Summer shines,
When the soft skies rose-mingled luster shed,
When Autumn sunbeams kiss the purple vines,
And when the snow-stars glisten—to them wing
Thy gentlest thought; they filled thy life with spring.

Think truly of the dead—
Let not thy heart be ever won away,
By eyes that laughing radiance o'er thee shed,
And flatteries breathed like incense round thy way;
Oh, deep and warm their love, and true their faith;
Thou shouldst not change—they changed not unto death.

Think sweetly of the dead—
All while they lingered in this world below,
The music of their voice, their smile, their tread,
Thrilled the glad soul, and taught the cheek its glow;
Lip unto lip, and heart to heart was pressed;
Shrine tenderly their memories in thy breast.

Think of the joyful dead—
As of sweet friends, whose blissful harp-notes ring
In that far clime where kindred souls are wed,
And heart to heart like lips of lovers cling.
Think joyfully, they breathe thy name in prayer,
And wait, and long to bid thee welcome there!

They think of thee—the dead—
The glorious dwellers in yon peopled skies!
Their thoughts, like dew-drops, on thy heart are shed;
They fill thy soul with blessed sanctities—
Sweet inspirations of the pure and fair—
The spring-time breathings of celestial air!

They dwell with thee—the dead—
Pavilioned in the auroral tents of light;
Their spheres of heavenly influence round thee spread,
Their pure transparence veiling them from sight.
Angelic ministers of love and peace,
Whose sweet solicitudes will never cease.

They strive with thee—the dead—
Spirit with spirit striving, heart with heart,
Alluring from the paths of Wrong you tread,
Spurned and resisted they may not depart.
In the dark prison of Life's last despair,
Lo! the delivering Angels with thee there!

They watch with thee—the dead—
Through the last agony, the doubt, the gloom,
When Soul and Body are through pain unwed,
And Night droops down—the midnight of the tomb;
And o'er the soul sense steals their wakening hymn,
Familiar—yet the song of Seraphim.

They welcome thee—the dead—
The soft, sweet glow of those beloved eyes
Balms each worn heart that long hath inly bled,
And gives new glory to God's Paradise!
Love and remember them—unseen, yet near—
Their white feet guide thee to the immortal sphere!

A STORY OF REAL LIFE.

There is an interesting class of the community, for whom many a heart beats with solicitude and apprehension. I mean the bright, ardent, and unsuspecting youth, just leaving the security of a loved home, the eye of a watchful parent, and the sweet influence of a sister, to be thrown at once into all the perils of a merchant's clerk, a mechanic's apprentice, or a college life, with no just idea of the dangers which beset their paths; or if they are in any measure aware of them, without the moral courage to resist them. I would like to specify many of these dangers, but shall now speak only of one, the cheap and poisonous books scattered throughout the land. The poison is so hidden, so mingled with what is alluring to the young, that ruin is effected before the victims are aware of any peril. I speak of those noxious books which pollute the heart, and plunge the simple and unsuspicious into vice and infidelity. I once saw a living victim of this pernicious reading, and such a story may yet be told of many a young man lost and ruined in our cities.

One Sunday evening, an old servant came in entreating me to go "into the kitchen and see a wild-looking man who asked permission to warm his feet." Upon my entrance he looked up, but instantly turned from me one of the finest faces I had ever seen. As I drew near, I wondered not that his feet were cold, for the relics of a tattered pair of boots, hardly hanging together over the shreds that had once been stockings, covered but a small part of his red and bruised insteps; he wore the remains of an old military dress which had been given him; still, there was something almost majestic in his appearance, for his head was a model for an artist, his eyes full and soft, his features all fine—it was a noble specimen of "nature's workmanship" in ruins. At first he seemed morose and unwilling to be teased by questions; but he had probably been unused to words of kindness, for when I proposed something to make him comfortable, he seemed melted and subdued, and manifested that kind of confidence which one feels among friends. The wickedness of wasting life so recklessly was represented to him, till at last, with a look of indescribable woe, and with shuddering emotion, he exclaimed, "Must I disclose to you what no one on earth beside myself knows? It was revealed to me by an unearthly voice, years ago, that I must die the 15th of next July. I am the victim of infidel books. I have destroyed my own soul, and I must die then, and go into eternal misery."

At that moment my father entered from church, and hearing his last words repeated with a dreadful emphasis, he said, "Why, you should have heard the sermon to which I have been listening; then you would have learned that it is never too late to repent." "Oh," exclaimed the poor vagrant, "you know nothing about it; there is no repentance for me." He discovered much ingenuity in answering every argument with appropriate texts of scripture, until at last, as if to escape from the annoyance, he abruptly said, "I will now disclose the revelation of which I spoke." He then related a dream, in which his soul was doomed to hell; and here he was so overcome with apparent horror, that we begged him to say no more of his dream, but to explain the cause of his misery. He then told us the name and residence of his parents, and spoke with great emotion of the piety and tenderness of his mother, whom he had not seen for eight years; nor had she had the slightest tidings from him during that time.

When very young, books were his delight, and he had access to the foolish tales which vitiate the taste of children. This excited a thirst for novels, which being ill-chosen and of a demoralizing character, led him on to other works of infidel writers. His watchful mother discovered his love for this dangerous reading, and, aided by his father's authority, forbade the indulgence; but as he found means to elude parental care, his father resolved to place him in the store of a pious man, whose eye would be constantly upon him. However, he eluded even his vigilance, and found access to the books; but being detected, he could not endure the restraint, and resolved to escape from it. After some difficulty, he secreted himself in a vessel bound to the Mediterranean, and escaped the detection of his master. From that time he had been a homeless wanderer in foreign lands. The details of his wanderings were thrillingly interesting, but his narrative was broken again by the most touching reference to his "dear mother," or by the terrific tones in which he would cry out, "Oh, those books—those wicked books! Oh, that Tom Paine knew my misery; my soul is lost, lost for ever." We saw that then was too much reason to regard his case as hopeless as he considered it, and believing his mother's care more essential than any thing to his well-being, we entreated him to go to her at once. Now and then he would promise to go; then again, with a covulsive shudder, he would start as from a distressing dream, and in a piteous tone repeat, "No, no, I can not see her;" and when urged to follow the example of the prodigal, he would still say, "No no; the prodigal did not oppose his mother, did not go contrary to the wishes or without the knowledge of his parents; his misery, his guilt, was not like mine—those books, those horrid books!"

Could any of those young men, just entering the world, realize the perfect wretchedness of this poor ruined being, they would as soon touch a viper as a questionable book. A fondness for reading has no doubt secured many a youth from ruin, but books must be well chosen; and parents who expose their children to the influence of immoral and corrupt sentiments, no matter under what guise, or whose example, may have their lives made miserable by such a son.

THE ANXIOUS INQUIRER DIRECTED.

How shall I come to God, for I am a sinful creature?

"Jesus said, I am the way; no man cometh unto the Father but by me." John 14: 6.

But how can I feel sure that Jesus will receive me?

"Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." John 6: 37.

I have nothing that I can bring to him.

"I will give unto him that is athrist of the fountain of the water of life freely." Rev. 21: 6.

But should I not first endeavor to purify my soul from sin?

"Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one." Job 14: 4. "Without me ye can do nothing." John 15: 5.

How, then, shall I come?

"By a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us through the veil, that is to say, his flesh." Heb. 10: 20.

Is God sure to receive me; can he love me?

"I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." 2 Cor. 6: 18.

What should be the object of my life?

"Ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's." 1 Cor. 6: 20.

Can my unimportant actions in any way glorify the everlasting God?

"Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit." John 15: 8.

What do you mean by fruit?

"The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." Gal. 5: 22, 23.

Does God, then, take notice of my daily conduct?

"I know the things that come into your mind, every one of them." Ezek. 11: 5. "He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see? he that teacheth man knowledge, shall he not know?"

I am very ignorant, who shall instruct me?

"Search the Scriptures." John 4: 39. "The Holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through that which is in Christ Jesus." 2 Tim. 3: 15.

But I have so many evil habits to combat; what shall I do?

"Gird up the loins of your mind." 1 Pet. 1: 13. "Fight the good fight of faith." 1 Tim. 6: 12. "For he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." Heb. 13: 5.

But there are trials and temptations in my way which others have not.

"There hath no temptation taken you, but such as is common to man; but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." 1 Cor. 10: 13.

I wish I had some friend who could understand all the trials of my spirit.

"We have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with the feelings of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." Heb. 4: 15.

It is my desire to walk uprightly, but I feel I have no strength.

"He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength." Isa. 40: 25.

May I go and ask him, then?

"If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him." James 1: 5.

How will God give me wisdom?

"I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments, and do them." Ezek. 36: 27.

When trouble comes, what shall I do?

"Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me." Psa. 1: 15.

In the hour of death?

"When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee." Isa. 43: 2.

And in the day of judgment?

"Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died." Rom. 8: 33, 34.

O! I will cast in my lot with God's people, for they only are happy.

"We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said, I will give it you; come thou with us, and we will do thee good." Numb. 10: 29.

"The Lord bless thee, and keep thee; the Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace." Numb. 6: 24—26. [Quiet Thoughts.

WHITE CRAVATS.

I have recently been on the sea, [illegible]ompany with two highly respectable orthodox ministers. They are men eminent for their talents and the excellence of their character, who have labored all their lives for the good of souls, and who have been useful by their publications as well as by their preaching. I believe them to have hearts full of love for human kind. Yet how little they seemed to mingle among their fellow-mortals, as having the same hopes, interests, and affections! Day after day of a long voyage, they walked the deck together, distinguished from all others by their white cravats, and by them separated from all contact with sinful humanity. Every man on the ship respected them; yet who that was not professedly religious would have ventured to disturb the religious solemnity that encircled them like a halo wherever they moved? These good men seemed as completely isolated from others, and shut out of the common sympathy, by their white cravats, as if they had been beings of another sphere, having no part nor lot with ours. Anybody would have known them anywhere for ministers, even without these badges.

Other men appeared in caps, slouched hats, rough coats, ugly plaid pantaloons, faded fancy neckcloths, and had a general half-civilized air. Not so our friends. They were in their usual high-crowned hats, long dignified overcoats, smooth white cravats, and polished boots. Their cloth was of the blackest black, their linen of the whitest white. As for their cravats, coal-smoke could not sully their purity, nor sea-fog take out the starch. Their wearers looked ready at any moment to have stepped into a pulpit, or to have performed a burial service. Their faces were long and serious, their whole deportment reserved and dignified—in a word, perfectly "ministerial;" the straitest Puritan would have been satisfied.

They held religious service at all customary times, in the most correct manner. I did hear it remarked that their preaching was not particularly appropriate to our situation, helpless creatures that we were, tossed upon the raging sea; but it was perfectly orthodox and proper.

Why, then, was there left such an unsatisfied feeling in my heart? Perhaps if I had only seen them in the company of good men I should not have felt this; but our passengers were men of the world, of pleasure or of ordinary business, with little thought beyond their daily amusements or gains; and however parties might be mixed up, or new companionships formed on the deck, none of these men by any accident fell in contact with the white cravats. These wandered up and down in solemn solitude. Like a white flag above a sunken rock, they seemed to point out an evil to be avoided. Indeed, you might have imagined from the rueful countenances looking out of them, that they were signals of distress. Was I wrong because my heart yearned to see these really kind men more fresh, genial, more full of human sympathy, more ready to take part in the conversation and pursuits of those around them? Could they ever hope to approach the hearts of such men without some connecting medium? How can such diverse classes of minds ever be brought together? Could they have expected ordinary mortals to meet them on the level of their own high spiritual and intellectual attainments? It is proverbially easier to descend than to climb; and if they had spoken to a fellow-passenger on a common topic, it might have led to a knowledge of his heart and life, which would have given chance to sow good seed.

I wondered if like theirs was the conduct of St. Paul on the ship that carried him to Italy. I was forced to believe it was not, from the personal interest and kindness he inspired, and because he elsewhere says, "To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak; I am made all things to all men that I might by all means save some." Were our friends all things to all men? No. They were nothing but orthodox ministers in white cravats. A LADY PASSENGER.

LORD CAMPBELL AND JOHN BUNYAN.—Lord Campbell, the present distinguished Chief Justice of England, in remarking upon the Pilgrim's Progress, says: "Little do we know what is for our permanent good. Had Bunyan been discharged and allowed to enjoy his liberty, he, no doubt, would have returned to his trade, filling up his intervals of leisure with field preaching; his name would not have survived his own generation, and he would have done little for the religious improvement of mankind. The prison doors were shut upon him for twelve years. Being cut off from the external world, he communed with his own soul—and inspired by Him who touched Isaiah's hallowed lips with fire, he composed the noblest allegory, the merit of which was first discovered by the lowly, but which is now lauded by the most refined critics; and which has done more to awaken piety, and to enforce the precepts of Christian morality, than all the sermons that have been published by all the Anglican Church."

It is told of Lord Norbury, that when passing sentence of death upon a man for stealing a watch, he said to the culprit: "My good fellow, you made a grasp at time, but you caught eternity."

It is a harder thing to avoid censure than to gain applause, for the latter may be done by one great or wise action. But to avoid censure, a man must pass his whole life without saying or doing one ill or foolish thing.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, April 14, 1853.

EARTH'S ROTATION AND THE SABBATH.

That the diurnal rotation of the earth upon its axis suggests difficulties in regard to the observance of the Sabbath, will not be denied. The chief difficulty may be thus stated. Suppose London, St. Petersburg, Jerusalem, or any other given point, to be the Prime Meridian, or the place where the days begin. Suppose the Sabbath to start from this point on its circuit round the globe. The whole circuit being performed in twenty-four hours, it is evident that, at every place fifteen degrees west of the Prime Meridian, the Sabbath will begin just one hour later. Thirty degrees west, it will begin two hours later; and at forty-[illegible] degrees west, it will begin three hou[illegible] At a hundred and eighty degre[illegible] the Prime Meridian, therefore, it wil[illegible] twelve hours later. That is, suppos[illegible] Sabbath to begin at the Prime Meridian at six o'clock P. M. on Friday, at the distance of one hundred and eighty degrees from that (which is on the opposite side of the globe) it will not commence till six o'clock A. M. on Saturday. By the same rule, at the distance of two hundred and seventy degrees west, or (which is the same thing) ninety degrees east of the Prime Meridian, the commencement of the Sabbath will be eighteen hours later, or at twelve o'clock on Saturday. Hence, at six o'clock P. M. on Saturday, or when the Sabbath is just ended at the Prime Meridian, it will have barely commenced at a little distance east of that point. Thus, if we take London as the Prime Meridian, the people of that metropolis will have ended their Sabbath observance just as the inhabitants of Dover are commencing theirs!

Such is a fair statement of the difficulty. It becomes, therefore, an important question, Where do the days begin? or, Where is the Prime Meridian? On the supposition that this meridian passes through Armenia, where (as it is supposed) man was created, the same difficulty still presents itself; when the Sabbath has ended there, it has but just begun at Ispahan and Madagascar! And as it is assumed that this would create confusion, it is inferred (on the ground that God is not the author of confusion) that the law of the Sabbath is not a universal law, but was designed for the Israelites in their own land.

Nevertheless, it is a reasonable presumption, that the days begin where man began to exist. If the Sabbath was made for man, (Mark 2: 27,) it is a fair presumption, that the first Sabbath began where man was created. But as the propagation of his species, and the replenishment of the earth, were embraced in his creation, it is also a fair presumption, that the Sabbath which was made for him was also adapted to his migrations eastward and westward. Now, as his migrations were from the place of his creation eastward and westward, till Asia, Africa, and Europe, were replenished with inhabitants, it would seem that the Prime Meridian ought to be so located, that all could cease from their labors, and keep holy time, without any such confusion as that which has been supposed.

It is evident that if, at the Prime Meridian, some barrier to intercourse existed, so that the inhabitants on our side could have no direct communication with those on the other, no confusion would be created by the observance of the Sabbath, notwithstanding the people on the east of the meridian would be commencing just as those on the west had ended. Yet, if we take Jerusalem, or some point in Armenia, for the Prime Meridian, no such barrier is found. Neither is there at London. The inhabitants east and west of either of these places have ready access to one another, and their mutual intercourse in the way of business is a matter of necessity.

Suppose, then, that we take some point in Armenia as a Central Meridian, so that when it is mid-day at that place, the Sabbath will be just at its end on the eastern coast of Asia, and just commencing on the Western Coast of America. We shall then have the very barrier to intercourse which was needed; for the Pacific Ocean, some ten thousand miles wide, intervenes between the two continents, and at the point where they approach nearest to each other, (Bhering's Straits,) such physical obstacles exist, as to about prevent all communication.

But this calculation makes the Sabbath to begin in Eastern Asia, more than a thousand miles from where man began to exist, while we have supposed the first Sabbath to have begun where man was created. But as the Sabbath was made for man, it was made for his necessities; and as it was necessary, in consequence of the multiplication of his species, that he should migrate from the place where he was created, so the Sabbath (so to speak) migrates with him. As he went eastward, he began his Sabbath earlier; and as he went westward, he began it later, but always in such a way as to agree, as nearly as possible, with the time set apart for the purpose at his original home. In this way, no confusion took place.

The objection we have been considering is certainly of no value to the most of those who are ready to avail themselves of it in controversy. To those who not only reject the Sabbath, but also the Sunday observance, and plead that all days are alike, it is of use. But if we felt the importance of observing any day at all in a religious way, we could not avail ourselves of such unfair means of controverting the views of those who differed from us. For, let it be supposed that the observance of that day, which God sanctified at the close of creation, is not required; and let it be supposed that the religious observance of the first day of the week is also not required; let it farther be supposed, that no particular day is enjoined to be observed religiously, and that all that is necessary is, that there be agreement in the community as to some day; the diurnal rotation of the earth upon its axis would operate as effectually against a day generally agreed upon, as against one divinely appointed. If, for example, the people of Germany should voluntarily agree to observe Thursday as a sacred day, the intercourse between them and the neighboring nations would create a necessity for its observance by the latter also; and so on, till all Europe and Asia had united in the observance. It would be necessary, in order to avoid confusion. Nevertheless, precisely the same difficulties would spring up in regard to the Prime Meridian, that are now supposed to be valid against the Sabbath observance.

Mere voluntary agreement in the observance of a day recuring at weekly intervals, does not, therefore, remedy the difficulty. It exists still in all its force; and unless those who offer it are fully prepared to forego the observance of any and all days whatever, and to blot out every thing bearing the remotest resemblance to the Sabbath, it would be wise in them never to advance such an objection again. We here dismiss the subject for the present.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday Railway Trains—The Crystal Palace—The Holy Places—The Madiai.

Glasgow, March 25th, 1853.

Two of our Scottish Railway Companies' meetings have again been made the occasion of talking of Sunday as if it were the Sabbath, and of requiring that work should not be done upon it—but, in both cases, again without success. At the North British Company's half-yearly meeting, in Edinburgh, this day week, the renewed motion for the cessation of Sunday traveling was made by Mr. Blackadder, but without entering upon argument to sustain the motion. The Chairman, for himself and other Directors, declared that the trains were not run for the Company's gain, but for the accommodation of the public, and that they did not wish to do more than supply their requirement. The discussion was carried no farther, nor was the vote taken.

Here, in Glasgow, three days ago, at the statutory meeting of the Caledonian Company, however, Mr. Meiklam inquired if there were any Goods trains running on their line on Sunday? Mr. Douglas Campbell, in reply, stated that there is a Goods train which, after traveling some hundreds of miles, arrives at the station here on Sunday morning at half-past two. Mr. Meiklam asked if a Goods train did not also pass along their line, arriving at Carlisle on Sunday? He was told in reply, that this Company have nothing to do with that. Mr. McMicking then brought forward the usual motion against Sunday traffic on the line; seconded by Mr. Keyden, who insisted that the Word of God required rest upon that day. Mr. Hutcheson, in replying, said that Mr. K. had given them the theology of the question, but with that they had nothing to do. He moved an amendment, that the matter be left to the judgment of the Directors. Mr. Meiklam, objecting to the countenance of Sunday traffic, said there are forty stations on the line; and that, as two men at least were requisite at each, the servants of the Company were largely deprived of the Sabbath. He had also seen thirty cabmen coming out of the gate of the Glasgow station, last Sunday, on the arrival of the train. A shareholder maintained that it was quite ridiculous to think of shutting up the railways on Sunday, in this great commercial country, when all the other routes have been closed. Mr. Douglas Campbell said that he believed the Directors had in their hands votes as three to one in favor of continuing to run these trains. During the past half-year, 19,000 passengers had been conveyed along the line on Sundays, and to shut it up would be most preposterous. The Directors had made great sacrifices for peace in trying to please those opposed to such trains; and if they thus persisted, that party would find that they made things worse for themselves, rather than better. For it would then be proper to consider, whether the present system of Sunday management should continue to be submitted to. The votes were taken; there were for shutting the railway, 1209 votes; against it, 3215. On notice being given for renewal of the motion at next meeting, two of the shareholders took a protest against its being entertained. It is thus quite evident, that Sunday railway traveling is on the increase, in spite of the Church's opposition and zeal, which, on the present occasion, led them to circulate a pamphlet on Sunday sanctification among the shareholders, preparatory to this meeting of the Caledonian Company.

In England, the clergymen are endeavoring to stir up meetings still to petition Parliament against the Sunday opening of the Crystal Palace—in which, of course, they are very successful. Their opponents, also, however, are doing their utmost to thwart these endeavors; although they are less systematic in their arrangements—the parochial and congregational machinery being awanting in their case. Meanwhile, the Palace itself progresses, and excites interest, and largely increases the value of ground in its vicinity. The Queen and Prince Albert lately went over the whole building, and are said to have been much gratified. Since then, (last Sunday morning,) their own home, the Palace, of Windsor, was discovered to be on fire, and considerable damage was done to that part of the building before it could be extinguished. The Queen is stated to have shown much composure on the occasion.

Almost every day has been bringing us rumors ominous of change in the East. The most contradictory reports have circulated as to the alternate successes of the Russians and French at the Court of the Turkish Sultan, in their diplomacy about the Holy Places of Jerusalem and Bethlehem. Prince Menzikoff, sent to Constantinople by the Czar on a special mission, seems to have been disposed, by the pomp and overbearing assumed, to overawe the Sultan into compliance with his demands; and a movement of the Franch and British fleets seemed likely to take place, and thus probably to lead to a conflict on the part of several of the European kingdoms. Whether Russia is to gain her ends at present or not, she seems to have considered the posture of affairs as favorable for making an attempt towards securing farther concessions—to be afterwards used in procuring more. The French Emperor is evidently unwilling to take strong measures in regard to any other power, until his coronation shall have given him place literally among "the crowned heads." What line of policy he may afterwards see fit to take in regard to the kingdoms, both of the East and of the West, is a point that will be observed with interest, both by those who know that it is the Lord who giveth kingdoms to whomsoever He will, and by those who are ignorant of this precious truth. When the Greek Patriarch left the Holy Land, he is said to have carried with him, not only the keys to which such importance is attached, but also to have taken jewels and bills to the amount of six millions of piastres, to bestow at Constantinople in presents.

The satisfaction with which the account of the liberation of the Madiai was received, will be much moderated by the fact that alrea dy the dungeon had nearly done its worst to Francesco. The chaplain of the British Embassy at Leghorn saw him just before he embarked for Marseilles, and intimates that his mental faculties are evidently impaired. What a weight of responsibility has thus been incurred!

MISSION OF YOUTHFUL SABBATH-KEEPERS—NO. 1.

Young Friends:

As you look forward to the future activities and prospects of life, doubtless bright anticipations excite you—youthful aspirations stimulate you. Hope, with radiant countenance, beckons onward to future greatness and renown. While some are looking to humbler spheres of activity, others fondly dream of influence and power—all dream of happiness. Some are doubtless eager to enter the race, the strife, the combat—your pulse beating high and quick, in anticipation of the bays that are to encircle your brows ere the sunset of life. You expect those who are already actors to give you a place and a chance proportionate to your natural or acquired powers—a privilege to work out your part in the labor of humanity—to fulfill your mission—and to pursue your way along the just-begun track of honor and immortality.

The participation, the reality, however, will present life as sober, earnest, and contending. In the strife of life, it will require all of your powers to come off victorious. In order to success, it is necessary that the true end of life be chosen in wisdom, and all the means for securing that end be guided by prudence. Without this, there will be vague dreamings, never to be realized—fitful action, with corresponding results—ending in disappointment and discontent.

Sabbath-keeping youth are especially liable to disappointment in this respect. They commence life, perhaps, with the illusion that office and emolument, riches and honor and influence, are as easily attained by them as by others; but, after traveling a short distance, they begin to see some of the difficulties in the way, and are prone to become desponding, give up all ideas of extensive usefulness, and settle down in inactivity—to complain of their lot, or else to abandon their religion for the world. This generally arises from groundless anticipations and false views of life, or from the want of the right motives and spirit. On the other hand, if you enter upon the activities of life, with the buoyant hopes, the unabated ardor, and vigorous energies of youthful laborers, and go to work in the right place, in the right manner, and for the right object, you can do much—can accomplish much—very much, that is good and great. This cannot be done unless you fully understand your position, relations, and duties.

Permit me, then, to present for your consideration, The mission of Sabbath-keeping young men and women—its leading characteristics and requirements.

Some of these characteristics and requirements you share in common with others—while some arise from your peculiar position and relations as Sabbath-keepers. We will first point out a few that are common—then some that are peculiar.

1. As individuals—as immortal, accountable beings—as members of the great human family—you have certain duties coëxtensive and harmonious with the duties of every other individual. First among these are duties you owe yourselves. The joys or sorrows of an endless future are the inheritance of every individual. The present position and future prospects of every youthful spirit are captivating and sublime, yet dangerous and solemn. Every youth is energized, excited, by the unspent powers of immortality. With eternal fires burning within, you, in common with others, stand like lights glimmering along the confines of the ocean of eternity, over whose misty, untried surface, you are to sail forever. You are ever to act in view of this destiny. You, likewise, have capacities that are capable of indefinite expansion and progress. These demand a careful self-culture—a spiritual growth. The duties which you owe your Creator and your brother man, demand of you assiduous preparation to meet those duties. No one is fit to assist others, till he has assisted himself—to instruct others, till he has himself been instructed—to exalt, ennoble others, till he has been himself ennobled—to inspire others to great and good deeds, till he has himself received the inspiration—to lead others on to truth and perfection, till he has started himself. Hence we have subjective duties—due to ourselves—which we must fulfill before we are prepared to fulfill our duties to others—duties lying back of all others, being imposed upon us by the very laws of our being. The demands of these laws must first be met; then you will be prepared to meet the obligations imposed by your relations to others. Enkindle a love—an enthusiasm—for truth, beauty, and goodness, in your own souls; then you are prepared to enkindle the same in other souls. Love the Lord your God with your might, mind, and strength, and your neighbors as yourselves; then you will be prepared to teach others to do the same.

2. On passing from the individual, we are first met with our social relations and duties. The domestic, social circle, is the great heart of humanity, around which must cluster the sympathies of the soul, the luster of learning, and the joys of religion. The amenities of friendship are to be enriched and exalted by science and religion. The social, benevolent affections, are to be cultivated—the selfish, dis-social, malevolent, are to be subdued. This is to be done, not by ignorance and chance, nor by the clear, quick, sagacious, powerful intellect alone; but it requires, also, the deep, the full, the tender, sympathetic soul. The finer, the lovelier qualities of a well-trained heart, are here to be called into exercise, and to have their full play. Here you, in common with others, have duties to perform—an influence to exert. It becomes you to prepare to labor for the domestic, social elevation of man—of society. Your hearts must ever be open to friendship and affection. Talent and learning must be dedicated to sympathy and love.

3. From the social, your mission, in common with others, extends outward, becoming political, patriotic. Many of you may never feel particularly called upon, either by your own sense of duty or propriety, or by the wish of others, to sanction or veto legislative laws—to talk and vote in legislative halls—nor from the bench to decide upon guilt and innocence, and legal questions—nor to fill the post of minor offices—nor even to exercise the right of the elective franchise—yet you all will have more or less of direct or indirect influence upon our civil and political institutions. The ethical and economical involve all of the great interests of a nation. The questions and principles arising from the ethical, if no others, fall within the legitimate sphere of every one possessing sufficient knowledge and religion to stand above the mist and dust and storm of party, and settle them in the clear, dispassionate light of reason and revelation. That man is capable of self-government—that governments and societies were made for man, not man for governments and societies—that the seeming paradoxical principles of the generalization of interests, and the development of individualism, are perfectly compatible with each other—that in so far forth as governments act in harmony with right, they tend to develop individual rights, equality, and happiness—are principles which the American Republic is faintly endeavoring to demonstrate to the world. The attempt to reduce such principles to practice, has already awakened the latent love for the same, in the Old World, enkindling fires that have gleamed forth with a startling vividness. The moral questions of a political character—the questions concerning freedom of body, of speech, and of conscience—towards which universal mind is so strongly tending at present, and which are continually vexing and tossing and upheaving nations—involve the well-being, the moral interests, of every individual. Whether it be your more particular sphere to influence minds that will be brought to bear upon the national destiny, or to act directly upon it yourselves, it is your duty to take your stand by the eternal principles of justice, equality, and liberty—and to let your influence be felt against national sins, of every kind and degree. Your sympathy, influence, and aid, are ever to be in behalf of humanity, struggling for its rights. You are to have a patriotism that reaches out towards every nation, kindred, and tongue—that labors to hasten the great brotherhood of nations, terminating in the universal brotherhood of man, practically regarded and carried out in all of his political, civil, and social relations.

Missionary Returned.—Rev. J. L. Shuck, Missionary to Shanghae from the Southern Baptist Board, arrived at New York March 26th, in the ship White Squall. Mr. Shuck left this country for Shanghae soon after it was announced that our missionary brethren Carpenter and Wardner had determined to establish themselves there. In one of his farewell addresses, he alluded to the Seventh-day Baptist Mission, and took occasion to enlarge upon the popular objection to keeping the Sabbath founded upon the possibility gaining or losing a day by sailing around the world. Some months ago we saw a statement, that he would return by way of San Francisco; and we hoped he would do so, that we might learn from him whether he had any trouble on this score about keeping the Sunday. It seems, however, that he concluded to return by the same route that he went, and of course he was all right when he reached New York.

Mission among the New York Heathen.—The missionary work among the miserable residents at the Five Points, New York, is conducted with energy and encouraging results. Mr. Pease, it is said, is about to extend his operations. From the first of next month he will occupy all the buildings on Little Water-street, between Cross and Anthony, with a single exception, for missionary purposes, besides another in Cross-street. They will undergo slight alterations. The "Industrial Home" will then have a front of about 150 feet. These buildings have been inhabited by the most depraved and abandoned characters. Among the proposed improvements is an apparatus for bathing. There are now 140 children in the day school, and the number of permanent residents in the Home is 115, exclusive of those who live elsewhere, but resort to the Home for employment. Of those in the school, no less than 40 are Italians.

MISSIONARIES TO THE PACIFIC COAST.

The ship "Trade Wind," Capt. Webber, took eight missionaries with their families to the Pacific coast. Letters from them announce their arrival at San Francisco, after a voyage of 102 days. "It was most wise," so one of them writes, "as far as health and comfort are concerned, that we went round Cape Horn." The following extract shows that their captain proved himself a gentleman and a Christian:—

"We have found Capt. Webber to be, in all respects, better than he was recommended to us, high as those recommendations were. He has left nothing undone that he could do, which would minister to our comfort. He has made us feel as if we were at home—as if he were a father to us all. He is a fine seaman—understands thoroughly all that relates to the ship and his duties, and makes the whole discipline move on with the precision and regularity of clock-work. The sailors regard him as a father and a friend. He is also a man of simple and earnest piety. He has seconded all of our efforts to do good among the passengers and crew. We have services on the Sabbath, twice each day, when the weather allows. He has required the sailors to be present at the morning service, and requested them to attend in the afternoon. We have had morning and evening devotions on deck; a Bible-class in the forecastle, on the Sabbath, and twice during the week in the cabin. We have had the communion administered twice."

The following extract from a report of the missionaries to the American Home Missionary Society, shows that "peril by fire," as well as by water, was the lot of this missionary band:—

Only one thing has occurred to us, in all of the passage, which has marred our happiness, and that was the great danger which our ship was once in from fire; but, by the kind interposition of that Providence which has conducted us hitherto, we were saved. It was on the morning of the 21st day of our passage, when in lat. 1° 14′, and long. 32° 38′, that one of the sailors came running to the officer on the quarter deck, crying out, "The ship is on fire!" This officer went forward, and saw the smoke coming out of the chain lockers and crevices of the deck. He ordered the force pump to be manned, and went back to the cabin, where Capt. W. and the passengers were at breakfast. He communicated the fact to the Captain, and they both left without any suspicions being excited as to the cause. After breakfast I went upon deck, and the unusual stir on the forecastle attracting my attention, I went forward, and soon learned the cause: the ship was on fire—in the cargo—somewhere, it was supposed, between the second and third decks; but how extensive the fire was, could not be immediately ascertained. A hole was cut through the deck, and a stream of water from the force pump, which would throw about five barrels per minute, was thrown in upon the burning mass. Several other places were cut, and lines for passing buckets were formed by the passengers. We toiled on in this way for some three hours, but could see no indications that we were getting the fire under. The ventilators seemed rather to show that it was spreading aft, under the cabin, which was then beginning to be filled with gas and smoke.

The ship was then turned head to the land; we were 450 miles from it. The powder magazine was hoisted upon the upper deck, and placed where it could be easily thrown overboard; the life-boats got out, and the provisions and water, and the clothing which we would need till we could reach the land, made ready. At this time another large opening was made, and a box, on fire, was broken to pieces, and its contents passed up upon the deck. Another and another were broken up in this manner, till a place was made large enough to admit one of the sailors, who boldly went down with the hose in his hand. He directed it against the burning mass, till he fell exhausted upon the floor. He was dragged out, and another, as bold as he, came to his place. In a moment or two, he fell, like his companion, and was dragged out insensible, and carried upon the deck. Another and another took his place, and shared his fate. Thus it went on till every one of our sixty sailors had taken his turn. At one time I counted sixteen of these generous fellows lying together on the deck. The ladies came from the cabin, and bathed their heads with camphor, which would, in most cases, bring them to in a short time. As soon as one was recovered sufficiently to walk, he would go back and offer his services again. Several of the men were brought out of this place insensible, as many as eight times. On the most of them the gas which they inhaled seemed to have an effect somewhat like that of laughing gas, particularly when they were partially resuscitated. It was no easy matter to restrain those powerful men, when they endeavored to throw themselves overboard, or to do themselves or us some personal harm.

For four hours we labored in this way, and you may imagine the terrors of our position. We could but fear that the strength of the men, self-sacrificing as they were, would not hold on till the flames were extinguished. Some of them could do no more, and these the hardiest of them all. We toiled on, however, —the passengers, gentlemen and ladies, working the pumps,—for another hour, when the joyful news came that the fire was out. No more flames could be seen, no more smoke arose. We began to breathe freely, and hope that deliverance had been sent to us. After the rest of an hour an examination was made, but no signs of fire were discovered. We all lay down upon the deck (it was very warm,) and passed the night. The next day was the Sabbath, and never did a more grateful, a more devout assembly, come together for the worship of God. The most daring and wicked among the sailors confessed that if God had not helped them, they could not have put out the fire. One of them said, when the ship was on fire, "You see now of how little use all this praying is which we have had aft. There was never a ship that went out of New York, that has had so much of it on board, and yet here she is, on fire." And yet this same man, when he went down into the hold, and saw what the fire had done, said, with a great deal of emotion, "If prayer didn't keep the ship from getting on fire, it must have had something to do in putting it out."

On Monday, the Captain ordered the cargo to be broken into, and a thorough examination to be made. It was found that the fire had burnt over a space which extended forty feet in one direction, and thirty in another. It had burnt through from one side of the ship to the other, and had burnt so nearly through the floor, or deck, that a blow of the hand would break it through. Had the fire made its way through the sides of the ship, I do not see how she could have been saved; as it was, it was a most difficult task. We owe our preservation, under God, to the fidelity of the men, and the excellence and power of the force pump with which the ship is provided. One of the men said to me, that the men would not have worked as they did for any other captain. They had no grudge against him that they wished to gratify. One of our sailors had once before been on board of a ship that was burned, and narrowly escaped with his life. When it became clear that our ship was dangerously on fire, he ran up and down, raving like a maniac. It was some time before he could be so quieted as to return to his duty.

After a very careful examination of the condition of the ship, the Captain came to the conclusion that she was not injured so as to require him, to put into Rio Janeiro. He thought that her strength was not weakened, as her timbers were not much burned. We went on, therefore, and have seen the land but twice in ninety-three days; once the coast of South America, near Cape St. Roque, and the land on both sides of the Straits of Le Marie, through which we passed soon after going by the Straits of Magellan.

Anti-Popery Lectures.—Father Gavazzi lectured at the Tabernacle in New York several evenings last week. His lectures are delivered partly in Italian and partly in English, and are received with great enthusiasm. The following, from a recent discourse to his countrymen, is an interesting piece of testimony in regard to the Papal system:—

"Do you think that the priests study the Bible? Out of one hundred priests, hardly thirty have a Bible; out of this thirty, only five read it, and only one studies it. Therefore study the Bible yourself, and do not leave it for another to do for you. Study the Bible to check the priest. Paul tells us to examine and investigate, and only to accept the teaching of such as preach the true Gospel. Had the Pope in Italy, Bible in hand, controlled the preaching of the priests, our terrible abuses would never have existed."

Missionary Intelligence.—At a missionary meeting in New York, on the 4th instant, several interesting items of missionary intelligence were reported. It appears, according to Mr. Lyons, of the Sandwich Island mission, that there has been a sad defection among those under his charge, attributable, in a great measure, to the use of rum among the natives. The cause of temperance, however, had been so much encouraged as to successfully counteract the influence of the distillers. Among other things reported from the Eastern Missions, is the completion of the Syraic edition of the Holy Bible, the appearance of which has been hailed with the most entire satisfaction, insuring, as it will, a knowledge of the Scripture in the vernacular, among the interesting people for whom it is intended.

Funds for the Dutch Reformed Church.—A member of the Dutch Reformed Church says that there is a prospect of a speedy adjustment by the Court of Equity of the princely legacies of Mrs. C. Steenwyck and J. Harpendinck, "the annual proceeds of which, amounting now to about $100,000, were solemnly dedicated by those benevolent donors, to be regularly applied to the payment of the salaries of the Pastors as Ministers of the Dutch Reformed Church in this city, 'and to no other purpose forever.' By this ample donation provision is made for the support of all who may labor in word and doctrine in this department of God's vineyard for many years to come, so as to free them from all worldly cares, and put them in a position to preach the gospel without fear or favor to all who may attend their ministry."

The New York Daily Tribune entered upon its thirteenth year April 11. The occasion was signalized by an enlargement which will require the proprietors (so they say) to pay more for the white paper on which the Tribune is printed than all they receive from its subscribers. Of course they rely upon the income from advertising to pay editors, printers, &c. "Complaints of small type, too fine print, bad for the eyes, &c.," seem to have had much wright in leading to the change. There are now thirteen persons connected with the establishment as proprietors, and one hundred and seventy more in various capacities.

Eld. Elias Burdick requests his correspondents to address him at Scott, Cortland Co., N. Y.

The Methodists of Hudson, N. Y., having increased in numbers, and the Quakers there having decreased, the two bodies have made an exchange of churches, the former paying the latter $1,050 difference.

The Dublin Evening Herald says that during the last year, no fewer than 40,000 Romanists in Ireland have joined the Protestant Church.

The Fourth Presbytery of New York has examined and licensed Messrs. Elias L. Bowen, Levi P. Crawford, Samuel Loomis, John Reid, and A. B. Swift.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Most of the Protestant missionaries belonging to the London Missionary Society, have found it necessary to quit Tahiti, on account of the arbitrary and unjust proceedings of the French government, directed by Napoleon III. A National Church has been formed, nonconformity with which is visited with severe pains and penalties. Fines and imprisonments have been the portion of several whose only crime is having a conscience.

A Bible written on palm leaves is preserved in the University of Gottingen. It contains 5,376 leaves. Another Bible, of the same material, is at Copenhagen. There were also in Sir Hans Sloane's collection, more than twenty manuscripts, in various languages, on the same material.

A recent classification of the inhabitants of the world in regard to religion gives the following results: Christians, 286,000,000; Jews, 5,500,000; Mahometans 116,000,000; Idolaters, 484,000,000. The Idolaters are thus classified—Budhists, 245,000,000; Brahmanists, 133,000,000; Pagans, 106,000,000.

The London Patriot holds out the hopeful prospect of an addition of twenty new missionaries to the number now laboring in India, under the auspices of the English Baptist Missionary Society. The increased expenditure will amount to about twenty-five thousand dollars annually.

A Mormon paper published in Liverpool professes to circulate 23,000 copies! At a late Conference 160 elders, 21 priests, 28 teachers, 67 deacons, and 2,332 members, were reported. They mainly belong to the lower and ignorant classes.

The Third Presbytery of New York, at its meeting last week, examined, and licensed to preach, the following gentlemen, connected with the Union Theological Seminary: Carson W. Adams; V. Le Roy Lockwood; Warren Mayo; John McCampbell; James J. McMahon; Aaron B. Peffers; Sigismund Uhlfelder; Theodore F. White, son of the late Dr. White.

At Barnstead, N. H., at the presidential election, fourteen persons voted, whose united ages were more than twelve hundred years, the leader being one hundred and two years old. In the same town a lady was baptized by immersion in a pond, by a Baptist clergyman, on her one hundredth birth-day. The population of Barnstead numbers 1,848.

Messrs. R. Edwards and W. Inglis, Wesleyan Missionaries, have been expelled from the Traus Vaal, or Boer Republic, for writing to the English authorities, charging that the Boers sold the Kaffir children, whom they captured in war, into Slavery. On the trial, the Missionaries offered to show that such had been actually the case, but it did not avail, and they were expelled.

The Maine Law in the Green Mountain State works gloriously, and what liquor it don't pour into the gutters it drives into the ground, under beds, and into woodpiles. Its moral force now begins to be properly appreciated, and its practical operation comes up to the expectations of its warmest friends.

The Asia sailed for Liverpool, April 6, with 110 passengers, among whom were six clergymen, viz: Rev. J. V. Henry, Jersey City; Rev. D. Chase, Philadelphia; Rev. W. G. Rooker, Kentucky; Rev. G. Nugent, England; Rev. Dr. Cook and Rev. Dr. Cocker.

One of the most interesting relics in Philadelphia may be seen in North Second street, viz: the first lightning rod erected by Dr. Franklin, which still stretches its attenuated fingers towards the heavens.

CITY MUNIFICENCE.—While we talk of the absorbing desire of gain, so common in cities, and the outrageous crimes, private and official, which come to light ever and anon, it is due to justice that the other side of the account be occasionally presented. If great cities like this abound in great sins, so also do they in noble acts of benevolence. There are no better Christians in the world, none more self-denying and faithful, than are to be found in the churches of New York. You will not unfrequently find the mistress of some Fifth-avenue mansion threading the dirty streets and staircases of the Five Points, on a mission of mercy, or doing some like work of charity, which not a few reputedly pious ladies in smaller places would shrink from doing. And if men are zealous for gain here, so not seldom are they proportionally ready to disburse it. It is stated that during the last twelve months nearly a million of dollars have been given by our citizens for benevolent purposes. Mr. Cooper heads the list with $400,000 for his great educational establishment going up near the new Bible House. Several others have given $100,000 to found St. Luke's Hospital. Others have given $100,000 to enlarge the New York Hospital, and others still $40,000 in aid of the University. The donations of Mr. Howland, Mr. Graham, and others, might be added. And yet after all there are thousands of private contributions, thousands never paraded in the columns of the newspapers, and known only to giver and receiver, which would swell the amount of our city's charities to many millions every year. Let this be borne in mind as some set-off to our many misdeeds and delinquencies.

"UNCLE TOM" AT LAW.—Mrs. STOWE'S famous novel, after a career without precedent in literature, has at last arrived where literature can show plenty of precedents—it has got before the Courts. It seems that Mr. F. W. THOMAS, a bookseller of Philadelphia, has caused Uncle Tom's Cabin to be translated into German, and has issued it in that language. This Mrs. Stowe regards as a violation of her copyright, and she has accordingly commenced a suit in the U. S. Circuit Court of that city against the publisher. In her complaint she not only alleges that she is the author of the original work, but that she has caused a German translation of it to be prepared and published, with the sale of which, as well as with her essential property in the book, the translation of Mr. Thomas is in conflict. She accordingly asks for a perpetual injunction upon his publication. And, whether in order that the principle involved may be settled, or because she considers herself greatly wronged in this case, or with a view to prevent other translations that might be made, she has declined a proposal to compromise with Mr. Thomas, and insists on letting the law take its course. Immense as the emigration from Ireland of past years has been, the "exodus" this spring gives promise of being greater than in any previous season, both to Australia and to America. The last Australian mail brought 935 registered letters for Ireland, each containing a remittance; and the Galway Packet states that by the last American mail upwards of £500 sterling was received in the village of Ballyvaughan, County Clare, for the purpose of enabling friends of earlier emigrants to join them in America.

On Saturday, 19th ult., a meeting of the originators of the "Women of England's Address on Slavery to the Women of America," was held at Stafford House, the Duchess of Sutherland presiding, and about forty ladies were present. A report was read, stating that the number of signatures to the address is 562,848, including some few from Paris, Jerusalem and elsewhere, and that Mrs. Stowe had undertaken to give it the greatest publicity in the United States. The address is illuminated on vellum, and the signatures bound in 26 folio volumes, and placed on view at the Caledonian Hotel, Adelphi, London.

Haynau's sudden death has surprised no one who knew what his habits were. He was a great eater, and the large quantities of strong wines and coffee which he drank continually, kept him in a state of unnatural excitement. His death is attributed to an affection of the heart, under which he had long labored.

The brother of Captain Ericsson has patented for him in Sweden his caloric discovery, and several Swedish shipping companies are inclined to adopt the new motive power forthwith.

The Madrid correspondent of the Morning Chronicle makes the following important statement: "Through the exertions of Lord Howden, the Spanish government has agreed to give complete liberty, before the end of the year, to that class of negroes called emancipados, after the completion of their five years consignacion, or apprenticeship. Those emancipados, who at the end of 1853 shall not have finished this term of servitude, will be manumitted according as their several probationary periods expire. This measure has been occupying the British Legation at Madrid, one way or another, for the last thirty years, and its concession now may be looked on as an earnest of better things, while it is not without its courage in the present disaffected state of Cuba."

At Wigan, on the 22d, at 1.20 P. M., just as some sixty men had ascended from the Arley Mine, and while they still stood on the brow of the pit, they were alarmed by hearing a very loud report, which was instantly followed by a great rush of air up both shafts. So violent was the rush up the up-cast shaft, that it forced up the thick iron plates around the mouth of the pit. Dense volumes of smoke, sulphur, and coal dust, ascending the up-cast shaft for nearly twenty minutes; and, though the down-cast was not so bad, still the rush up that was very fierce for a time. Some idea may be formed of the extreme violence of the shock, when we state that, though the workings are more than four hundred yards below the surface of the earth, the tables and other moveable things in the Navigation Inn, and other houses near the Britania Bridge, were shaken; and this, too, at a distance of three hundred yards from the mouth of the pit. Tidings of the calamity spread rapidly through the town, and the greatest apprehensions were felt for the safety of all in the pit. The underlooker, two browmen, and a few other persons, were on the brow at the time they heard the report, and they instantly set in motion a small pumping engine, which raised water from a back well fed by the canal, and poured it into the down-cast shaft. This was done to drive out the sulphurous air or "choke damp" which now filled it. It was 2 o'clock before the state of the air enabled any person to descend; and the first to go down were Jones, the underlooker, and Henry Burrell, underlooker of the adjoining coal mine, which belongs to the same company, with some other men who had volunteered. On reaching the bottom, they found all the lights extinguished by the rush of wind, but by the aid of the lamps they carried, they looked upon an awful scene. Men lay in different directions, some bruised, stunned, and nearly suffocated, others dead. All the air doors and other stoppings were blown down, and everything seemed a perfect wreck. Jones and one or two other men stayed down, but the others ascended, the air being impregnated to such an extent that they could not breathe sufficiently, and those who did stay down were unable to enter the workings. Finally, on clearing out the pit, there were found the bodies of forty dead persons, and six wounded. Others known to have been in the mine, could not be found.

California News.

The steamship Illinois, from Chagres, arrived at New York on the 9th inst., bringing $2,005,404 in gold dust, the California mails which left San Francisco on the 16th ult., and 375 passengers.

By this arrival, we have news of the total loss of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's steamer Tennessee, which occurred near San Francisco, on the 12th ultimo, by running ashore in a fog. The Tennessee had on board six hundred passengers, one hundred of whom were ladies and children—all saved. The Tennessee was built in New York in 1848, was rated an A 1 steamer, and valued at $200,000. She was owned by Howland & Aspinwall, of this city. She was insured in England for $100,000. Three deaths occurred on board the steamship Tennessee on her passage up to San Francisco, previous to her going on shore, one of which was Mr. Stevens, the express messenger of Wells, Fargo & Co., who died of yellow fever.

At San Francisco, much anxiety was felt for the safety of the Vanderbilt steamship Independence, from which nothing had been heard, though she was thirty days beyond her time. She had a large number of passengers on board. She was to have connected with the steamship Northern Light, from New York, January 20, and was last seen on the 15th of February, off Cape St. Lucas. Hopes were entertained that she had put into some intermediate port. The steamer Sea Bird had gone in search of her.

The town of Weaverville, near Shasta, was entirely destroyed by fire on the night of the 7th ult. Loss estimated at about $100,000.

A difficulty had taken place between the Indians and miners in the vicinity of Tehama, growing out of sundry thefts and depredations peculiar to the savage race. The Americans rose in a body and slaughtered some fifteen or twenty belonging to one tribe.

A report was brought to Sonora on the 12th ult., that the famous robber Joaquin was seen at a fandango house, in the vicinity of Quartzburg, a day or two before. He was recognized by some one who cried out "Joaquin," when the robber rushed upon him, and a desperate fight ensued between Joaquin's men and the citizens, in which two or three Americans were killed and others wounded. But the robbers are said to have escaped as usual.

Indian difficulties in the northern part of the State continue to disturb the peaceful occupation of the miners.

The mail by the Golden Gate, which left San Francisco on the 16th ult., was the largest ever made up for the Atlantic. It contained one hundred and fifty thousand letters and thirty-five thousand newspapers.

The Chinese in California number 25,000.

Another cargo of ice has reached San Francisco from the Russian American settlements at Sitka.

From Oregon our accounts are to the 7th ult. The small-pox was raging fearfully among the Indians in Oregon and about Cape Flattery.

Gold in considerable quantities had been found east of the Cascade Mountains, Oregon.

WORLD'S TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.—The undersigned, in concurrence with a resolution of the Massachusetts Temperance Convention, respectfully invite the friends of Temperance, in each State and in Canada, to appoint some person or persons to meet in the City of New York, on Thursday, the 12th of May next, at 9 A. M., to make arrangements for the holding of a great Temperance Convention in said City, during the World's Fair. Place of meeting will be duly notified. All communications relative to such Convention may be addressed to Rev. E. W. Jackson, Philadelphia.

CROTON WATER.—The suddenly increasing demands upon the Croton Department for water, create the most serious apprehension with regard to the supplies. For months past the water in the reservoirs has been far below the intended mark, and at this time, in the Distributing Reservoir, it is eleven feet below. In case of a fire like that of 1845, the citizens would be obliged to depend upon the flow from the aqueduct, as the reservoirs would be completely drained. This condition has been long foreseen by the President of the Croton Department, and for the past three years he has from time to time urged upon the Common Council the necessity of constructing another and much larger Reservoir, and of such an alteration of the High Bridge as would allow the flow of the entire capacity of the aqueduct—the present inverted syphon only transmitting about half as much as a continuous aqueduct would do. The Board have pointed out and explained the very inadequate accommodations for storing water on the island, and forcibly set forth the great danger of relying upon the present resources.

CALIFORNIA NEWS.—By an arrival at New Orleans, we have San Francisco dates to March 15. The steamship Tennessee, on her way from Panama, with six hundred passengers, ran on shore in a fog, when within a few hours of San Francisco. All the passengers and the mails were saved. Much anxiety was felt as to the fate of the Independence, of the Vanderbilt line, which was then out thirty days beyond her time. Accounts from the mines were favorable, and new mines of great value were reported to have been found in Oregon. The town of Weaversville, in Trinity Co., Cal., had been destroyed by fire.

The Savannah (Ga.) News is credibly informed that a company of twelve women and girls, in Taylor County, near the line of the Mucogee Railroad, in that State, are felling the largest pines in the forest, sawing them into blocks, and riving and drawing shingles for market.

SUMMARY.

A Mr. Keeler, of Keelerville, Mich., and his wife, were found dead in their house recently. The house had been closed for one or two days, the neighbors supposing the family was absent on a visit. Judge K. being quite anxious in regard their absence, entered the house, and found the dead bodies of his children. The wife was lying on the floor, with a pillow under her head, handkerchief around her face, and properly laid out, as is usual with a corpse. The son was found on a bed, and gave evidence of having died in great agony. It is supposed Mr. Keeler first shot his wife through the heart, arrayed her in the position in which she was found, and, taking poison, intended to lay himself beside her and die.

The Territorial Legislature adjourned sine die on the 5th ultimo, after having greatly simplified the code of legal proceedure in the Courts of the territory. Chancery suits are now made to conform to the simplicity of the forms in civil actions. Eleven new Counties have been organized in the territory recently purchased from the Sioux Indians. These Counties are as yet sparsely settled, but emigrants will fill them up during the approaching summer; and accordingly the Legislature has made provision for the establishment of common schools, the location and improvement of highways and ferries, judicial privileges, &c. Several railroad companies were chartered.

Under the head of European News will be found a statement of the interesting fact of the determination of the Spanish Government to set entirely free a great number of negroes known in its colonies as Emancipados. These are those who have been brought over from Africa as slaves, but were released by British intervention before finding their way into the slave market. The measure will add very largely to the free black population of Cuba, and may be considered as a step toward that predominance of the black race, which seems to be the destiny of the Antilles.

The night express passenger train going West, on Monday night, April 4, and due at Binghamton on Tuesday morning at 10 minutes past 2, when passing along the Delaware, west of the bridge, came in contact with a large rock—weighing three or four tons—which had fallen from the bank above, directly on the track. The whole train was thrown off the track, and the baggage car came near being precipitated into the river. The fireman was instantly killed. Mr. I. Tallman, the engineer, was mortally injured, and died in about half an hour.

One of the colored boys who were abducted from Hamilton, (C. W.,) a few weeks since, and who were supposed to have been sold into Slavery by one Smith, of that city, has returned. Smith had been tried and acquitted for want of evidence, but as we learn by the Gazette, has been reärrested since the return of the boy Bachus, and will undergo another examination. He gave bail in the sum of £1,000 for his appearance at Court to answer the charges against him.

Gen. Thomas Marshall, of Lewis County Ky., was killed on Tuesday evening, by a man named Tyler, who shot him with a rifle. The Maysville Eagle gives no particulars, as the rumors are conflicting. The only account which has reached us states that Marshall, with firearms, pursued Tyler to his house, threatening and apparently determined to kill him, and that the latter shot the former in self-defense. Marshall was a man of intemperate habits, and violent, overbearing demeanor.

The Raleigh Register says a telegraphic dispatch, forwarded to that office from Cheraw, South Carolina, informs us that the jail of Chesterfield was consumed by fire on Tuesday morning—destroying the lives of eight persons. Of the persons destroyed were a man by the name of Martin, his wife and brother. Martin was confined for stealing, and his wife and brother were in the jail on a visit to him when the awful accident occurred.

Mr. E. N. Serrell, Engineer, is now engaged in making surveys from Hoboken to Syracuse, viâ Suffern, Montgomery Co, "The Traps" on the Shawangunk Mountains, and Delhi. This route will be 110 miles shorter than any other between the termini, and the grades and curves will be favorable. If this route proves as feasible as its friends anticipate, it will be of very great advantage to New York and Syracuse, as well as to all the counties through which it will pass.

Large amounts of Silver are daily being sent to the mint by Banks in this and other cities for coinage, and the mint will be fully occupied for some time. About $100,000 is already coined, and will be delivered about the 15th of this month. We have seen one of the quarter-dollars, which is a very handsome coin. The price offered for Silver is, if the coin be new, a fraction over 4 per cent. premium on American, and about 5 per cent. on Mexican dollars.

Abner Curtis, a great shoe manufacturer at East Abington, Mass., proposes to some twenty or thirty young men in his employ, that if they will, by prudence and economy, respectively save one hundred dollars the current year, and commit matrimony before the first day of January next, he will make them each a New Year's present of a house lot, and one hundred dollars in cash, to aid them in the erection of a cottage upon the same.

A dispatch dated Cincinnati, Tuesday, April 5, 1853, says: The boiler in Phelps & Jordan's Rolling-mill at Covington exploded at noon to-day, and destroyed the building. Eight persons were dangerously wounded, and a great number were injured, as about 200 persons were working at and around the building. The boiler was carried 200 feet, and fell into the Licking River. The explosion is attributed to the neglect of the engineer.

In the U. S. Senate, the other day, Mr. Brodhead called up his resolution requesting information as to the amount of the United States and State stocks and bonds, of all kinds, held abroad. He made a few remarks upon the subject, and estimated that at the present time the balance against us was $64,000,000, to be met by exporting $37,000,000 of gold and silver, and by Federal, State and other stocks.

Six thousand, and probably a greater number, of Swiss citizens, from the Canton of Tessin, residents in Lombardy, have recently been expelled by the Austrian Government, and this in a cruel manner, without even granting them the necessary time to arrange and realize their little property.

The Green Bay Advocate says it has been informed that there will be 14,000,000 or 15,000,000 feet more lumber shipped from that place during the coming season than during the previous one. It adds: "We never have had a better winter for getting out logs, and our lumbermen have improved it to the extent of their means and force."

The Superintendent of the Banking Department has given notice that the bonds and mortgages deposited by the Farmers' Bank of Onondaga County as security for its circulating notes, will be offered at public sale, at the capitol in Albany, at noon of the 20th inst. The mortgages are thirteen in number, all on lands in the town of Holland, Erie County.

A letter from Europe states that Mr. Barringer has procured from the Queen of Spain the pardon and release of the eight Hungarian prisoners of the Lopez expedition. It will be remembered that they were made exceptions to the general pardon granted to the Americans of that expedition, and confined at Ceuta.

At Rodebaugh's Station, near Greensburg, on the Pennsylvania Railroad, Mr. Rodebaugh was standing on the road, when a locomotive came up and struck him, throwing him six feet off the road. His back was broken, and he sustained other injuries, causing instant death.

There is a building in San Francisco, of 100 feet front, 80 feet deep, and four stories high, all of solid granite, which was put up in Canton, block by block, by Chinese workmen; and the blocks being all numbered, the building was taken down, conveyed to California, and re-erected in San Francisco by the same hands.

There is a corn field on the Roanoke river, at the place where it is crossed by the Weldon and Portsmouth railroad, which is ten miles long, and as wide as the low grounds of the river are broad. This little patch of corn is worked by a man named Pollock, who owns two thousand slaves to work it.

It is stated that since the reduction of fare to Albany on the Harlem railroad, the receipts for through business have increased 50 per cent. This is another practical demonstration of what has been so often asserted and proved, that low fares almost invariably bring an increase of revenue.

A writer in the National Intelligencer complains of the names given to new cities, towns, &c., in this country, and says that he himself is a citizen of Dresden, close by Vienna, on the road to Naples, between Antwerp and Corinth, in Indiana.

The value of the coral taken last year on the coast of Algeria was $400,000. A hundred and fifty vessels were engaged in the business. Most of the coral was sold at Naples.

Arrangements are made whereby passengers may go from New York to Buffalo in 14 hours, by way of the Central Roads. A Lightning Line will run from Albany to Buffalo in ten hours.

Hon. Daniel S. Dickinson has declined the Collectorship of the port of New York, to which he had been appointed by the President and Senate. Judge Bronson has been appointed to the post.

A dispatch, dated Claremont, N. H., April 5, says that the house of Arnold Farr, of West Claremont, was burnt the previous night, and that three children perished in the flame.

The Legislature of New York has voted to adjourn on Fourth-day, April 13. The Temperance Bill will probably fail.

On Sabbath, April 9, the U. S. Senate decided to adjourn sine die on Second-day, April 11.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels. Surveyors' Compasses; Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

Extract of a Letter from Hon. Wm. Jay to the Author.

"Your analysis of the slave laws is very able, and your exhibition of their practical application by the Southern Courts, evinces great and careful research." "Your book is as impregnable against the charge of exaggeration as Euclid's Geometry, since, like that, it consists of propositions and demonstrations. The book is not only true, but it is unquestionably true."

Miscellaneous.

The Hippodrome.

In the vicinity of the New York Crystal Palace for the Exhibition of the Industry of All Nations, several other buildings for show purposes are going up, one of which is described as follows:—

"The Hippodrome is in the form of an ellipse, covering a space of 338 feet by 196½ feet. A gallery extends the full circumference, 20 feet deep, allowing a passage way, and seven tiers of seats, calculated to accommodate nearly 10,000 spectators. These tiers are firmly supported on posts, and rather seem to prop than derive any support from the light wall. The tiers will be divided into three classes—the Broadway side being first class seats, the Twenty-fourth street, second, and Twenty-third street side, third class. Over the s[illegible] and resting, is a light covering of bo[illegible] which will be sheeted over with tin. The covering of the remaining part of the large arena will be of canvas, of three colors, the red, white and blue. To support this, a pole, seventy feet high, will be planted in the center, and a circle of quarter poles, forty feet in height, and thirty-five feet from the center. The canvas roof will present a handsome appearance—that of an immense tent—in festoons from the center to quarter poles, and again to the poles in front of the tiers. At the corner of Twenty-third street and Broadway is an octagon tower, the basement intended for a ticket office, and second story as a saloon. On the corner of Twenty-fourth street and Broadway is a square tower, for similar purposes. There are five doors of egress from the building; and some seventy windows throw light upon the scene. At night it will be illuminated by one thousand burners. The estimated cost of the building is about $20,000. A level track of race-ground, twenty feet wide, will extend in front of the seats, and a road down the center, forty feet in width. An artificial canal will be introduced, crossing the area, and fountains will play at each corner. The ground will be laid out with shrubs and flowers. The Hippodrome, when completed, (which is expected by the 1st of May,) will surpass any thing of the kind hitherto attempted, in elegance and capacity.

"It is stated that Franconi, with the most extensive troupe of performers in the world, may be expected to arrive here early in April, and it is determined that the vast establishment shall be opened to the public on the second day of May. A number of highly trained horses, ostriches, dromedaries and deer, have already arrived; and other animals, with chariots, trappings and equipage, are now on their way from Europe. In the arena, about one thousand feet in circumference, will be illustrated chariot races with female charioteers, hurdle races, and representations of many of the most attractive games of ancient Greece and Rome. Grand tournaments will also be produced, with upwards of a hundred horsemen and horsewomen in full costume and armor, within the great arena at the same time. It is intended that the costume and appointments shall be of the most gorgeous character, with a strict regard to historical accuracy in every detail. The national sports of various countries will be represented. The stag-hunts of the English, the Arab in pursuit of the ostrich, the Laplander on his reindeer-drawn sledge, the amusements of several nations and eras, with many features of an original character."

Penny Wisdom.

The following, from Dickens' "Household Words," are good specimens of the penny wisdom which is often little valued because it is so cheap. The success of most undertakings of the present day depends upon turning every thing to some account. The time never was before when the fragments are all gathered up, that nothing be lost, as they are now.

Schoolboys display great skill in breaking their slates. Shall they be allowed to continue the exercise of this interesting practice, or shall we invite them to use the new Wurtemburg sheet-iron slates? A manufacturer in that country has invented a mode of applying a surface-coating to sheet-iron, which enables it to take freely the mark of a slate-pencil; it is said to be much lighter, and much less liable to injury, than a common slate. If we have sheet-iron slates, why not sheet-iron paper? Baron von Kleist, the proprietor of some iron works at Neudeck, in Bohemia, has lately produced paper of this kind, from which great things seem to be expected. It is remarkable for its extreme thinness, flexibility, and strength, and is entirely without flaws. It is used in making buttons, and various other articles shaped by stamping; and it is capable of receiving a very high polish. Whether the world is ever to see the Times printed on a sheet of iron, we must leave to some clairvoyant to determine; but no sooner did our manufacturers become acquainted with this Bohemain product at the Great Exhibition, than they instantly set their wits to work to produce better and thinner sheet-iron than had before been made in England. In the Birmingham department, before the Exhibition closed, there made its appearance a book, about five inches by three, consisting of forty-four leaves of sheet-iron, the whole weighing about two ounces and a half. We are thus getting on; the age of iron literature may yet arrive.

If a ton of lead contains three ounces of silver—one ounce in twelve thousand ounces—will it pay to dig out this silver, mechanically or chemically? Will it save a penny? Mr. Pattison, a manufacturing chemist at Newcastle, says and shows that it will; although, before his improvements were introduced, the attempt was a losing one, unless the lead contained at least twenty ounces of silver to the ton. Nearly all lead ore contains a trace of silver, which becomes melted and combined in the ingot or pig of lead. Vast are the arrangements which the manufacturers are willing to make to extricate this morsel of silver from the mass in which it is buried; huge furnaces, and melting-vessels, and crystalizing vessels are provided, and elaborate processes are carefully conducted. The lead itself is all the better for losing its silvery companion; while the silver makes its appearance afterwards in the form of dazzling tea-services, and such like.

Whether any perfumed lady would be disconcerted at learning the sources of her perfumes, each lady must decide for herself; but it seems that Mr. De la Rue and Dr. Hoffman, in their capacities as jurors of the Great Exhibition, have made terrible havoc among the perfumery. They have found that many of the scents said to be procured from flowers and fruits are really produced from any thing but flowery sources. The perfumers are chemists enough to know that similar odors may be often produced from dissimilar substances; and if the half-crown bottle of perfume really has the required odor, the perfumer does not expect to be asked what kind of odor was emitted by the substance whence the perfume was obtained. Now, Doctor Lyon Playfair, in his summary of the jury investigation above alluded to, broadly tells us that these primary odors are often most unbearable. "A peculiarly fetid oil, termed fusel oil, is formed in making brandy and whiskey; this fusel oil, distilled with sulphuric acid and acetate of potash, gives the oil of pears. The oil of apples is made from the same fusel oil, by distillation with sulphuric acid and bichromate of potash. The oil of pine-apples is obtained from a product of the action of putrid cheese on sugar, or by making a soap with butter, and distilling it with alcohol and sulphuric acid, and is now largely employed in England in making pine-apple ale. Oil of grapes and oil of cognac, used to impart the flavor of French cognac to British brandy, are little else than fusel oil. The artificial oil of bitter almonds, now so largely employed in perfuming soap and for flavoring confectionery, is prepared by the action of nitric acid on the fetid oils of gas-tar. Many a fair forehead is damped with eau de mille-fleurs, without knowing that its essential ingredient is derived from the drainage of cow-houses." In all such cases as these, the chemical science involved is really of a high order, and the perfume produced is a bona fide perfume, not one whit less sterling than if produced from fruits and flowers. The only question is one of commercial honesty, in giving a name no longer applicable, and charging too highly for a cheaply produced scent. This mode of saving a penny is chemically right, but commercially wrong.

Chemistry is here the grand economizer. Chemistry is indeed Nature's housewife, making the best of every thing. "The clippings of the traveling tinker," as Dr. Playfair well says in one of his lectures, "are mixed with the parings of horses' hoofs from the smithy, or the cast-off woollen garments of the inhabitants of a sister isle, and soon afterwards, in the form of dyes of brightest blue, grace the dress of courtly dames. The main ingredient of the ink with which I now write was possibly once part of the broken hoop of an old beer-barrel. The bones of dead animals yield the chief constituent of lucifer matches, The dregs of port wine—carefully rejected by the port wine drinker in decanting his favorite beverage—are taken by him in the morning, in the form of Seidlitz powders, to remove the effects of his debauch. The offal of the streets and the washings of coal-gas reäppear carefully preserved in the lady's smelling bottle, or are used by her to flavor blanc mange for her friends."

California, Australia, and the cost of reaching them.

We have received (says the editor of the N. Y. Tribune) many more letters than we can find time to answer, asking us which is the best way of reaching California or Australia—what is the total cost of the voyage—which country proffers the greatest inducements to immigrants, &c., &c. We cannot answer these questions so fully and accurately as we should prefer to, but here is a part of the information desired:—

California.

The U. S. Mail Steamship Line (Howland & Aspinwall's) dispatches a steamship from this port for Navy Bay, Aspinwall, (Isthmus of Darien, near Chagres, and the Atlantic terminus of the unfinished Panama Railroad) on the 5th, 13th, 20th, and 28th of each month. When the regular day of sailing falls on Sunday, the vessel is detained till next day. The rates of passage by this route are as follows: First Cabin, $200, Second Cabin, $150, Steerage, $85.

These prices do not include the cost of traversing the Isthmus, which is said to to be $10 to $25, and is probably much nearer the latter sum than the former. Passengers are landed free of charge at the Railroad Depot, Aspinwall, whence they must make their own way to Panama as they see fit. The Panama Railroad now takes them about half way across (to Gorgona) in two or three hours, for $5; thence the only conveyance is by mules over a horrible road. Arrived at Panama, the Pacific steamers of this line will generally be found in readiness to take passengers to San Francisco. Its agent here is Charles A. Whitney, 177 West-st. Each passenger is allowed 250 lbs. of baggage free on the steamboat in either ocean; but he must run his own risks with it on the Isthmus.

The Nicaragua or Vanderbilt's Line crosses the Isthmus from San Juan de Nicaragua to San Juan del Sur, by way of the River San Juan and Lake Nicaragua. The water route on this line is nearly 1,000 miles shorter than by Panama, but the Isthmus is here some 200 miles wider. The difference in time between New York and San Francisco on these routes respectively is slight, but we think the Nicaragua has rather the advantage. Better allow a month for either. Its rates of passage, (including transit of person across the Isthmus,) are as follows: First Cabin, $300; Second Cabin, $225 to $250; Steerage (upper) $120 to $160; Steerage (lower) $110.

Passengers board themselves from ship to ship in crossing the Isthmus. They are allowed 25 lbs. of baggage across free; for all over that weight, 15 cents per pound is charged. New York agent, C. Vanderbilt, 9 Battery-place.

—There are two Opposition Lines by way of Panama, of one of which the agency is with Davis, Brooks & Co., 26 Broadway; the other with E. Mills, 51 Cortland-st.

Australia.

There are ships departing from our port each week for Sydney, Melbourne, or some other Australian port. The rates of passage vary, but are generally as follows:—Saloon, $200 to $250; First Cabin, $150 to $200; Second Cabin, $125 to $140, and still lower rates for steerage, where such are taken. But he must be very needy or very greedy who would wish to take a cheeper and less comfortable passage than a Second Cabin. There are vessels which offer to carry cheaper than the above rates, but they are generally small or slow sailers. The regular packets sail on the 1st of every month. Provisions are included in the price, where not otherwise specified. The length of the voyage is nearly as great as that to California around Cape Horn—say from 100 to 200 days. One or two steamships are advertised to make the voyage this season, and will probably make it in 60 to 90 days, but they charge higher rates than sailing vessels.

The following general hints should be considered by those seeking passages to either of the Golden countries:—

1. Have no dealings with runners of any sort. 2. Buy no tickets of strolling agents, or other than responsible persons. 3. Always pay your money into the office of some respectable company or shipping house, and be sure that you receive in turn the proper acknowledgement. 4. Take no ticket or receipt that does not specify the day of sailing, and none that specifies, "Accidents by the sea excepted." No such stipulation is needed to give the owners all proper protection in case of such accident. 5. Always visit and examine the ship, if possible, before taking passage, and if you don't know a staunch, safe, good sailer, have some nautical friend go with you and give you his opinion of her qualities. The voyage will be long enough, tedious enough, at best; and a week's delay at the start for the best vessel in port may land you a month earlier. 6. If you are assured that a vessel will sail within a day or two, and see that she has not a third of a cargo on board, it is safe to apprehend that she is not off yet, and will not be for a week or two. 7. If you should not reach your Ophir these six months, you need not fear that the Gold will all be dug when you get there. 8. If you fancy you are going where money can be made without hard work, and that destitute, broken-down, disappointed, desparing people are not as plentiful in California or Australia as here, you are doomed to be sadly disappointed.

Glimpses of Life in New York.

"We crossed from this District, [Five Points,] which seemed mostly peopled by Irish, with a sprinkling of Germans, Italians, and a few Americans, and passed into some of the streets and lanes of the quarter known as Little Germany, near the East River. We found ourselves in the grand market of rags, and were amazed at the vastness of the business growing out of the cast-off tatters of our City. From one street, we passed through a narrow lane into a long court flanked with innumerable tenements, apparently crammed from cellar to garret with rag-pickers, whose reeking spoils, gathered from docks and gutters, were hung upon lines to dry, darkening the sky with their blackness, as with the wings of the obscene harpies. These rag-pickers seemed to be a very industrious and civil class, miserable enough, indeed, as to tenements, yet by no means without comforts. Drawn by the sight of some little children and a very old woman at the door, we went into a room on the first floor, and saw a large family with only that room and a large closet for quarters. The man said that he paid four dollars a month rent, and earned about four dollars a week; so that he could barely live. He said that it was hard to go to sleep on account of the bugs. Looking into the closet, which no courtesy could call a bedroom, we saw two beds crowded into the narrow space, beneath walls and ceilings which were all spotted with the blood marks of the vermin. We found, at the entrance of another huge court of German rag-pickers, a thrifty-looking Irishman, who kept guard over a great store-room, in which an ocean of rags, loose and in bales, were gathered for the wholesale market. He was inclined to take a cheerful view of his tributary laborers, whose returns he purchased, and said that many of them had money in the bank. Of the truth of his assertion we have no means of judging, although we can hardly conceive of any more rigid economy than appears to prevail in this quarter. There must be great suffering, especially when sickness cuts off the daily work, and we found several families thus afflicted. In one room we found a stout man watching over a young infant, and were told by him that it was a twin child, and that the mother had gone out with the other to the doctor. Near by, in Avenue D, we visited an industrial school, where nearly a hundred girls had been gathered, and who, with clean clothes and faces, were at the time learning the use of the needle under the guidance of an efficient teacher, assisted by committees of ladies, whose look and air showed social refinement as well as Christian purpose. The scholars were going to a long table in classes, to take a wholesome repast, and they addressed themselves to the rice and molasses with evident satisfaction. A considerable portion of these scholars, are, we are told, from the ranks of the street-sweepers, who haunt every crossing on a wet day.

Singular Phenomenon.

Some months ago, Mr. Nicholas Flint, of Great Valley, in digging a well, after excavating to the depth of about forty feet, and finding no water, determined to dig no deeper, as the space had already become so small that he was afraid, should he sink it deeper, that the sides would fall in, if he attempted to stone it up. He accordingly abandoned it, throwing planks across the mouth to prevent accident, intending to fill it up again when he had leisure.

One day he heard a singular noise, which seemed to proceed from the well, and on going to it, he discovered that it was caused by a heavy draft of air forcing itself up from the well. This continued for some days, when the current of air became reversed, and there was a strong draft downwards, so much so, that light substances brought near the crevices in the planks were instantly drawn in. He then procured a piece of pump log, about two feet long, with an aperture of two inches in diameter, and inserted this firmly in one of the planks. The air, as it forces itself into or out of this tube, makes a roaring sound, which can be heard for nearly a mile. In fact, this well seems now to perform all the breathing functions of a huge pair of lungs, although the inhalations and exhaltations continue for a much longer period than in any animal now known. as it is sometimes several days in drawing in its breath, and as long a time in forcing it out.

The boys in the neighborhood often amuse themselves, while exhalation is going on, by pulling their caps over the end of the tube, to see them thrown several feet in the air. Another fact is, that the respiratory organs of this breathing monster seem to be entirely under the control of the atmosphere—so that, in addition to its other singularities, it acts the double part of thermometer and barometer. For some hours preceding a change from a lower to a higher degree of temperature, the inhalations grow less and less, until it is finally imperceptible; then the air commences rushing out, the current growing stronger and stronger, until the weather has become settled, after which it again subsides, to await another depression of the mercury, "to take in another breadth." Reclaiming Land.

In the vicinity of Brandon, Suffolk, England, there is a great deal of land that has not paid for cultivation. It is a dry sand, and where attempts have been made in a dry season, after the corn (meaning grain) has sprung up, a strong wind has carried the corn and earth away together, and the labor and seed were lost. I have known the public road leading to Brandon so filled with this sand, that it has been obliged to be cut through, the same as drifted snow. A few years ago a trial was made by a farmer on this land, which has succeeded so well, that a great deal of it is now profitably cultivated. The process was this:

It was then all open field. A certain quantity, say 10 or 12 acres, was planted around by fir trees. These trees broke the force of the wind. It was ploughed and then covered over with light short straw from the stable or cow yard. This was on the approach of winter. It was then folded by sheep, which were fed by turnips or a small portion of hay, and the folds were moved about every other day till the whole piece had been folded. This, with the dung of the sheep, and refuse of what was given them, was trampled in, and proved a slight covering on the sand. It was then lightly covered with marl or clay, which the frosts of winter broke up. It was then spread about by a strong fork over the entire surface of the ground. In the Spring it was ploughed and sowed with oats, yielding the first year a light crop. The next winter the same course was repeated—and with the oats a few grass seeds which sprang up in the Spring with the oats, binding the earth more firmly about the roots of the oats. In the harvest it was cut down with the oats, making the straw more profitable—though the crop was not heavy. This plan, continued for a few years, has made fine farm land, some of which is laid down as grass land, while other parts are cultivated, and will now bear wheat or barley.

The first experiment being thus successful, it was generally adopted, and now where it was nothing but flint and sand, neat little farms are seen, and many families are well supported upon them.

About the time this plan was adopted, a gentleman bought 100 acres on one of the most barren places conceivable. He there built a neat and substantial house, mostly of flint collected on his own land, and it was thought by lookers on that the man was mad, to build a house on such a desolate spot. But the land cost him but little. He now set about tilling his land, and on the north and eastern sides, fenced it in with fir scantling about eight feet high—planting young fir trees all around the other parts of it, with a slight rail fence to keep out cattle that passed by. He also planted over the centre small coppices of fir around a square, to be ornamental withal. These grew up and helped in every direction to break off the wind. The plan I have mentioned was then adopted by him, and in a few years he was surrounded by flourishing plantations, and a neat small park where he could keep a few sheep, two or three cows, and a horse or two, and grow hay for their use in winter. This plan succeeding so well, induced other men of small income to purchase from 10 to 20 acres, and in the midst of it they have built neat cottages, and have gardens and a plantation around them, where they can keep a cow and a pig, and do nicely.

The London road, for a considerable distance before you arrive at Brandon, is now like a pleasant grove, adorned on either side with new cottages. It is protected from drift sand, and Macadamized, and is one of the finest roads in England, aside from the beauty and scenery of the place. In these plantations moreover is game of every kind.

Handwriting.

At a recent sitting of the Academy of Sciences, some papers were read relative to handwriting. Among the facts stated, the most remarkable was, that no man can ever get rid of the style of handwriting peculiar to his nation. If he be English, he always writes in English style; if French, in the French style; if German, Italian, or Spanish, in the style peculiar to his nation. I am acquainted with a Frenchman, who has passed all his life in England, and who is English in dress, habits, tastes, everything, who speaks English like one of our countrymen, and writes English with ten times more correctness than ninety-nine in the hundred of us, but who cannot, for the very life of him, imitate our mode of writing. I have also heard speak of a Scotch youth who was carefully educated in this country, and for eighteen years of his life mixed exclusively with French writing-masters, and perhaps never saw anything but French writing in his life, always wrote in the same style as we all do; it was really national instinct. In Paris, all the writing-masters profess to teach the English manner of writing, but with all their exertions, they can never get their pupils to adopt any but the cramped hand of the French. Some person pretended that he could tell the character of individuals by their handwritings. I know not whether he spoke the truth or not, but assuredly he might have asserted, with the most perfect confidence, that he could distinguish a man's country by his handwriting. The difference between our writing and that of the French is immense—a school-boy could distinguish it at a glance. Mix together a hundred sheets of manuscripts written by a hundred of our own countrymen, and no one would fail to say which was the French, even though they should all be written in the same language, and with pens, ink and paper. The difference between Italian and Spanish and German styles of writing are equally great.

Duck Training.—Col. Jaques, who resides at the Ten Hill Farm in Medford, Mass., has a novel way of obtaining wild ducks. Recently he had an accession of ten to his flock. Last fall almost thirty wild ducks were ensnared in Maine and captured alive; their wings were clipped to prevent their escape, and thus they gradually became domesticated. Col. Jaques, who is a naturalist as well as an excellent farmer, purchased them and carried them to his farm, where they were at liberty to roam over acres of marsh and upland; they became accustomed to his call, and do not now manifest the least disposition to emigrate. If a stranger enters the yard, they manifest the utmost alarm and make an attempt to fly. By their peculiar call, and the freedom which they enjoy to traverse the margin of the Mystic River and the marshes, they attract other wild ducks, which make a shy descent and remain for a time, then take to flight, but not being alarmed, repeat their visits; then they lay their eggs, and finally become accustomed to the call of the Colonel, who will not suffer them to be molested, and remain upon the premises. The ten ducks came from ponds in Medford, and are now on his premises. So says the Boston Chronicle.

Low Fares.

The large reduction in railroad fares during three years past, is noticeable. It is within the recollection of every body, when it cost some $12 to get from Buffalo to Albany, and twenty-four hours time at that. One hundred per cent. has been taken from the cost, and more than that from the time. The New York and Erie Railroad Company have also reduced their fare; and the Hudson River Railroad, with a capital stock of $12,000,000, has carried through passengers from its opening, with the exception of some few winter months, at the rate of one cent per mile. The Harlem Railroad does the same, and both roads expect to sustain themselves by doing a large business upon small profits. To show that the idea is a feasible one, the following calculation has been made of the comparative cost of carrying a large and small number of passengers:

The cost of running a passenger car with forty passengers, a hundred miles, is estimated at $27, and the receipts on forty passengers at two and a half cents per mile, is $100. Net income $73. The additional cost of a train with eighty-two passengers would be only the expense of running another car, or $2, making $29. While the receipts at 1¼ cents per mile, one half of the above rates, would be $102 50, leaving a net income of $73 50. In like manner, the cost of a train with one hundred and twenty passengers is shown to be only $31, and receipts at one cent per mile would be $120, leaving a net income of $89. It follows, from these figures, that if low fares increase the travel in the relative proportion estimated, a reduction of fare to the minimum amount would not diminish the net receipts. Ups and Downs of Rulers.—It is said that when Louis Napoleon had announced his intended marriage, and preparations were ordered to begin for the grand procession to Notre Dame, the inquiry arose where the State carriages were to come from. The period of time was not sufficient to have new ones built, as the bridegroom desired, so that it was finally concluded to use those of the last dynasty, which were laid away at Versailles. Accordingly the coaches were brought out, and dispatched to the painters, with orders to have the arms of Louis Phillippe erased, and those of the Empire substituted. But when the artist had expunged the escutcheon of Orleans, he found that of the elder Bourbons beneath it, and proceeding to move this, he discovered under all the shield of the first Napoleon. Thus the new Empress rode to Notre Dame in the same coach that was used for Josephine; in the same that appeared in the procession of Louis the Eighteenth; in the same that the King of the Frennh employed.

Ship Building in Maine.—Maine is the greatest ship building State in the Union; and perhaps no district of country in the world of equal maritime frontier can vie with her in this particular. Ships are the great crop of the State. We have not the last annual returns at hand, but not less than 100,000 tuns of shipping were built in that State during the last fiscal year, or more than half of the sea-going tunnage added to our commercial marine during that period. This branch of business has increased very rapidly within a few years throughout the State, as well as all over the country. But we see that the prospect is that the business is to be prosecuted to a much greater extent the coming season than ever before. In a single town in the Waldoboro' District (Rockland) 10,000 tuns are to be built against 4,300 tuns last year. The Belfast and other more eastern Districts also propose to largely extend their business. In Bath an unusually large number of ships are on the stocks and projected. According to the Bath Tribune about 17,000 tuns, mostly ships, are under way.

Within thirty-six hours the Marine Insurance offices in State-street, Boston, recently received intelligence of the loss of three ships, the aggregate insurance on which was over four hundred thousand dollars!

The Poughkeepsie Telegraph states that the double track of the Hudson River Railway will be laid entirely through its whole length by the first of August next.

Mr. Wm. J. McAlpin, State Engineer, has accepted the post of Chief Engineer of the Erie Railroad, and also that of Assistant President, to take effect in April.

The printers and publishers of newspapers in Connecticut and Michigan respectively have decided to hold State Newspaporial Conventions at an early day.

The Grand Jury of Knox Co., Tenn., have found true bills against the Corporation of Knoxville, for keeping the streets in a bad condition.

The Fulton County (O.) Democrat states that a Mr. Van Fleet, of that County, shot three deers at one shot.

The Hudson River is again open, and boats are running between New York and Albany every night. Fare 50 cents; berths 50 cents.

Navigation on Lake Erie has been resumed. The steamer America came into Dunkirk on the 23d of March.

The Students in the various Departments of the University of Virginia, at Charlottesville, number at present 439.

Hon. Thomas F. Marshall is making speeches against the adoption of the Maine Liquor Law in Kentucky.

The Maine Liquor Law has been killed in he Assembly of Wisconsin by one vote.

No. 13—The Bible Sabbath. 24 pp.
No. 14—Delaying Obedience. 4 pp.
No. 15—An Appeal for the Restoration of the Bible Sabbath, in an Address to the Baptists, from the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference. 40 pp.

The Society has also published the following works, to which attention is invited:—

A Defense of the Sabbath, in reply to Ward on the Fourth Commandment. By George Carlow. First printed in London, in 1724; reprinted at Stonington, Ct., in 1802; now republished in a revised form. 168 pp.
The Royal Law Contended for. By Edward Stennet. First printed in London, in 1658. 60 pp.
Vindication of the True Sabbath, by J. W. Morton, late Missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. 64 pp.
Also, a periodical sheet, quarto, The Sabbath Vindicator. Price $1 00 per hundred.

The series of fifteen tracts, together with Edward Stennett's "Royal Law Contended for," and J. W. Morton's "Vindication of the True Sabbath," may be had in a bound volume. Price 50 cents.

These tracts will be furnished to those wishing them for distribution or sale, at the rate of 15 pages for one cent. Persons desiring them can have them forwarded by mail or otherwise, on sending their address, with a remittance, to George B. Utter, Corresponding Secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

The Sabbath Recorder,

Published Weekly.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in Advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

THE BIBLE IN OUR COMMON SCHOOLS.

BY C. ROLLIN BURDICK, A. B.

I approach a subject fraught with the most vital interest. It is not in the power of words, such as men can command, to do it justice. Had I the tongue of an angel, I suppose I could hardly exaggerate the importance of it. I have in mind the inculcation upon the young of the great moral truths which govern the universe—that kind of training which will give them not only mental power, but ability to know right and wrong, to so shape their way through the labyrinthian paths of life as to secure to themselves the crown of glory and immortality which awaits the righteous hereafter. It is to put into their hands the chart and compass by which they can guide their barque, among rocks, shoals and quicksands, into the haven of safety.

On yonder boisterous sea are launched many vessels. Ever and anon you see one and another foundered by the turbulent waves, or dashed upon hidden rocks, and lost amid the foam of the breakers. The shore is strewn with the wrecks of the thousand crafts that have gone to ruin. And you need not wonder. Their pilot was false, their compass cheated, their chart was wrong, and their helm was insufficient. How could they outride the storm? But yonder is a ship launched upon the same ocean. The storms rage and spend their fury about her; the winds, marshaling their hosts, rush with impetuous fury upon her; rains, descending in torrents, drench her; hail-stones pelt her; lightnings play about her masts; thunders are bellowing above her, and mountain waves dash over her; yet she outrides the storm. She comes safe into port. And why? The Bible is her compass—the Bible is her chart—the Bible is her helm—the Bible is her pilot—the Bible is her ballast—the Bible is her lightning rod—the Bible is her covering from the rain and waves—and she cannot be lost.

In view of its importance, then, I would have the Bible used as any other text book, studied, conned, its character as a literary production examined, its excellencies pointed out, its historical facts considered and weighed, its biographies noticed, and its flights of oratory analyzed and commended to the young as the most perfect models which any writers have ever produced. I would have it read as a reader daily during the great part of the student's course. Some of the reasons for this, I will endeavor to show.

First, with regard to the style of the writings of the Bible. Its simplicity is unrivaled by any production of the unassisted human intellect. There are no extravagant hyperboles, and no useless flowers of speech. The writers have a plain, matter-of-fact, common-sense way of expressing themselves. They are not guilty of long and tedious perorations, introductions, and apologies; but, on the contrary, when they have a matter to communicate, they come right to the point at once, and say what they have to say, in the plainest, shortest, and most perspicuous language possible. Take for example the first sentence in the holy book. "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." What can be more simple and beautiful. Follow the whole narrative through the creation and fall of man, and the subsequent events preceding the deluge, and where can you find a more simple, and yet a more beautiful and interesting history? And what can be more fascinating than the pictures of pastoral life among the patriarchs who lived after the flood? The whole written in so plain and easy a style, that any child of ordinary attainments, at eight years old, can understand them, and yet the most cultivated find ample food for their intellects in conning them over and contemplating their beauties.

The Bible, as one entire book, consists of three heads or departments, somewhat mingled, but still distinct enough to be noticeable. 1st. The historic. 2d. The doctrinal. 3d. The prophetic. The historic portion of the Old Testament extends to the book of Job; the doctrinal from Job to Isaiah; and the prophetic through the remainder of this part of the Bible. In the New Testament, the historic runs through the four gospels and the Acts; the doctrinal, commencing with Romans, extends to Revelations; and the prophetic through Revelations.

As a history, the Bible stands preëminently the oldest and most reliable in the world. In it we have the only reliable account of the world before the deluge. And for hundreds of years after the flood, it furnishes us with the only credible history of man. Its importance, then, as a history, is clearly seen. Any thing, and the only thing, which gives us a clue to the origin of this mighty globe, our present habitation, cannot fail of being highly interesting. And more interesting still must be the history of the origin of the human race, which it furnishes. Here only do we learn the fact that men constitute one great brotherhood, having descended from the same parents. Here we learn that all caste is unnatural—that the right of one man to hold the person of another as his property, is illegitimate—and that despotism, in any of its forms, is unholy, having its origin in the bottomless pit. These are lessons too important to be withheld from the youth of a Republic. They should be constantly taught, and every one should become familiar with them.

In the Bible, we have a connected account of a nation springing from one man; increasing rapidly, until it finally numbered many millions; transported in its infancy to a land far distant from the place where it had its origin, to be nourished and saved from the mighty famine that was desolating its territory, and in due time led out by the mighty hand and out-stretched arm of Jehovah, from the presence of their enemies, over mountains and through vallies, while seas receded before their march, rocks burst forth in living streams to slake their thirst, and the clouds of heaven poured down their abundance of manna to feed them in the wilderness. They march onward until they find themselves at the foot of Sinai's Mount, where, amid the thunderings and terrors of Almighty power, they received the law; and thence, waving their standard, and led on by the God of Battles, "their conquering armies enter the promised land. The idolatrous nations inhabiting it fall before them like the leaves of autumn, or flee like chaff before the wind, leaving them in possession of that land flowing with milk and honey."

The history of this people has no parallel, either in richness of incident, or in the displays which it gives of the character and attributes of God, in the dispensation of justice and mercy to the human race. Do his chosen people keep his commandments? He pours upon them the fullness of his rich blessings. Do they sin? After suitable warnings his judgments come upon them with the force of the tornado, scattering them to the four corners of the globe. Thus he shows that he is no respecter of persons. This teaches an important lesson, which every child should learn, the sooner the better. If it were generally inculcated, many erroneous notions with regaad to the dispensations of Providence would never find a place in the mind of man. How many rich men have formed the notion that they are the more highly favored of God, and consequently better than the poor man, who labors for his daily bread. Had they learned this lesson, they might be led to see that their wealth is rather a curse than a blessing from the hand of God. It will also teach the poor man to be content with his lot. Where can a child have a better opportunity of learning such lessons, than in the well-conducted common school?

THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.

What time in the week did he rise?

That many people are mistaken in supposing that our Lord was crucified on the sixth day of the week, and rose on the first day of the week, is evident from several passages of Scripture. That he was to rise "the third day" after he was crucified, we have Matt. 16: 21, 17: 23, and 20: 19; Mark 9: 31 and 10: 34; Luke 9: 22, 18: 33, and 24: 7—46. "Destroy this temple, (the temple of his body,) and in three days I will raise it up." John 2: 19. "After three days I will rise again." Mark 8: 31, Matt. 27: 63. As a sign to the Jews that he was the true Messiah, he said, "For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." Matt. 12: 40.

Now, to say that Christ did rise the "third day," and "in three days," and "after three days," we must admit that he rose at or in the end of "three days and three nights" from the time that Joseph laid the body in the new tomb. If Joseph laid the body of Jesus in the new tomb at "even," (Mark 15: 42,) then it follows that he did rise at "even," and not in the morning; for if we begin at "even" to count three days and three nights, either way, we come to "even" again. If we say that he was risen "in the end of the [seventh day] Sabbath," which would be before sunset on the seventh day of the week, according to Matt. 28: 1, 6; and if then we begin to count back to find the time that the body was laid in the new tomb, it will be thus:

In the end of the sixth day of the week, (called Friday,) would be one day and one night.

In the end of the fifth day of the week, (called Thursday,) would be two days and two nights.

In the end of the fourth day of the week, (called Wednesday,) would be "three days and three nights."

This brings us back to the "midst of the week." See Dan. 9: 27. Now we will begin at the "even" of the fourth day of the week, and count the other way, to find the time of his resurrection.

The even of the fifth day of the week would be one day and one night.

The even of the sixth day of the week would be two days and two nights.

The even of the seventh day of the week would be "three days and three nights."

There were two Sabbath days while the body of our Lord was in the new tomb. The first "Sabbath day was an high day." John 19: 31. This was the next day after he was crucified. Mark 15: 42, Luke 23: 54. The second Sabbath day was "the Sabbath day according to the commandment." Luke 23: 56, Exod. 20: 10. These two Sabbath days are thus distinguished by the apostles, so that we may know which Sabbath they are speaking about. It is not said, that the women which followed Christ rested on the high Sabbath of the Jews; but they "returned and prepared spices and ointments, and rested the Sabbath day, according to the commandment." Luke 23: 56. Showing, that their Lord had taught them to regard the commandments of God. Neither does it appear that the "chief priests and pharisees" were very strict in observing the high Sabbath; for they "came together unto Pilate, saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, After three days I will rise again. Command, therefore, that the sepulchre be made sure until the third day." And having obtained authority, "they went and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch." Matt. 27: 62. This last part of their bloody work being done on the fifth day of the week, would enable one of the disciples, on the next first day of the week, to say, "To-day is the third day since these things were done." Luke 24: 21.

Now, we will take particular notice whether "Joseph, who also himself was Jesus' disciple," did take the body, and lay it in the new tomb, before the high Sabbath commenced, which would commence at sunset. Luke 23: 53 gives an account of the body being laid in the sepulchre; and the next verse (54th) says, "And that day was the preparation, and the Sabbath drew on." Now, it appears that this was done before the high Sabbath commenced. And if it was done before the high Sabbath commenced, then it follows, that Jesus rose before the first day of the week commenced, which would also commence at sunset after the Sabbath of the commandment. Mark 1: 21, 32.

Objection.—It is said, (Mark 16: 9,) "Now, when Jesus was risen, early the first day of the week, he appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had cast seven devils."

Answer.—This scripture does not say that he did rise early the first day of the week; but that he "was risen early." Matthew, who wrote the first gospel, says, "In the end of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week, came Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, to see the sepulchre. And behold, there was a great earthquake." In the margin, it says, there "had been" a great earthquake, &c. Matt. 23: 1. And the angel said, (verse 6,) "He is not here, for he is risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay." Now, I understand by this plain scripture, that our Lord was risen some time before the "end of the Sabbath," and some time before the first day of the week commenced. But still I will be very much obliged to any man who can show me that our Lord did rise on the first day of the week, though this, in my mind, would have no effect to change the Sabbath of the commandment.

B. CLARKE.

SIR JAMSETJEE JEEJEEBHOY.

We are indebted to the North American Review for a chapter of mercantile biography, which may be well commended to the imitation of Christian merchants.

Jeejeebhoy, the Parsee Merchant, has risen from poverty and obscurity to wealth and distinction, as a shipper and a merchant at Bombay. In the acquisition of his fortune, he adopted principles which doubled its value—learning at the same time how to spend it for the benefit of his fellow-man. The record is before us of a small part of his gifts for twenty years, and yet it amounts to 608,000 rupees, or more than $300,000. He expended 200,000 rupees for the supply of Poona with pure water. He erected an inn for the accommodation of poor travelers, at the cost of 80,000 rupees, endowed it with 50,000 rupees, and his wife added another 20,000. Not a year has passed without some act of munificence. The schools of Calcutta and Bombay, the benevolent societies, the public works in all parts of the country, have all been aided by his wide-spread charity. No bigoted faith, no false feeling of nationality, no narrow standard of judgment, has ruled his efforts for the good of mankind. He

> 'Grasps the whole world of reason, life and sense,
> In one whole system of benevolence.'

The homage paid to this benevolent merchant has been very marked. The Queen of England has conferred on him a patent of knighthood, at the solicitation of the East India Company. Kinsmen and friends presented him an address, accompanied by a testimonial of the value of 15,000 rupees—not after the American method of a silver service or a statue, but to form a "translation fund" for "defraying the expenses of translating into the Goojuratee language such books from European or Asiatic languages as may be approved by the Committee, to be by them published and distributed gratis, or at a low price, among the Parsee community, in furtherance of the education of the people."

In accepting this testimonial, the princely merchant utters sentiments worthy of Christian emulation. He says: "I shall ever wish my name to be connected with every endeavor to diffuse knowledge among our people; and the surest way to incite them to elevate and improve themselves, is to spread far and wide among them, gratuitously, or in a cheap form, translations into our language of the most approved authors." And he demonstrates the fitness of the memorial, by the munificent sum of 300,000 rupees—$150,000—as a fund to be applied "towards relieving the indigent Parsees of Bombay and Surat, and the education of their children," to be managed by the Committee who tendered him the honor of the memorial.

The wife of Sir Jamsetjee Jeeheebhoy shares his generous spirit. At a cost of 175,000 rupees, she has constructed a causeway at a point between Salsette and Bombay, where a dangerous ferry previously existed, and a loss of life was frequent. And this seems not to be a solitary instance of benevolence.

STARS SINK ONE BY ONE FROM SIGHT.

The stars sink one by one from sight,
No trace of them we find;
They vanish from the brow of night,
And none is left behind
Alone,
And none is left behind.

The sun goes down to his ocean bed,
In all his rays enshrined;
He wraps them round his crimson head,
And leaveth none behind
To mourn,
And leaveth none behind.

The beautiful and gifted dead,
The noblest of our kind,
Have cast their work aside, and fled,
And we are left behind
Alone,
And we are left behind.

The dear old friends of early time,
Hearts round our hearts entwined,
Have faded from us in their prime,
And we are left behind
To mourn,
And we are left behind.

Pale stars, red sun, ye come again,
For whom no hearts have pined;
We call our darlings back in vain,
Still we are left behind
Alone,
Still we are left behind.

O! dear ones, teach us so to run
Our race, in sun and wind,
That we may win where ye have won,
Though we be left behind
Awhile,
Though we be left behind.

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE.

These two Universities, says the editor of Household Words, consist of forty-one colleges—twenty-four at Oxford, and seventeen at Cambridge. They are two learned corporations, governed by their own laws and their own dignitaries, assembling in Oxford, under the name of a Convocation, and in Cambridge, under that of a Senate. Each college, however, has its own peculiar laws, its own funds, and its own special character. One is more devoted to theology, another to philosophy, another to classical literature, another to medicine; and one or two are distinguished, like the Magdalen at Cambridge, for such qualifications as are more akin to the arts and mysteries of the grand turf than to any of the fine arts, or the mystic meaning of the white surplice.

In each University, one college takes the lead of the rest, like a Triton among the fishes. In Oxford, it is Christ's Church; and in Cambridge, it is Trinity. There are the royal apartments for the sovereign; and there, upon the largest scale, you may perceive the distinguishing peculiarities of college life. Trinity College, Cambridge, is, we believe, the richest college in the world; but its chapel is not so large, nor so transcendently beautiful as that of King's College; nor is its dining hall so large as that of Christ's Church, Oxford. The finest chapel in the world is that of King's College, and yet it is only appropriated for seventy Eaton boys, for whose sake alone King's College was endowed, and the chapel built. That chapel is three hundred and sixteen feet—interior, two hundred and ninety-one—in length, and the height of the ceiling, seventy-eight. It contains twenty-six windows, each fifty feet high, and all but one—the west—magnificently painted, and so costly in their preservation, that the very cleaning and burnishing of each window, which must be done in London, piece by piece, inflicts a bill of £200 on the college treasury. Such magnificence is not to be seen in any cathedral in England. Trinity College chapel is smaller, being only two hundred and four feet in length, interior, and forty-four feet high, though even this is much longer than Oxford Cathedral, which is the chapel of Christ Church College. But as Trinity College contains about one-third of the students of Cambridge, its chapel is filled to overflowing, and is one of the most interesting sights which the University presents; for at each of the Colleges and Universities, on what are called surplice days—that is Saturday, Sunday, and Saint's days or eves—the students all attend in their white surplices; and there, at one view, you see the future chancellors, bishops, prime ministers, judges, and legislators of England.

The kitchen of Trinity College, Cambridge, supplied food for one thousand one hundred mouths daily. The hall, which is one hundred feet long, forty broad, and fifty high, is not sufficiently large to dine one-half of the students. There are two dinners, and many dine at their own apartments. The cellar contains about four hundred barrels of ale, four of which are emptied daily. Even the butler keeps his carriage and his livery servants, and is reckoned a man of £3,000 per annum. Food there is over-abundant; for nothing is ever sent twice to table. The remnants go to certain officials; and a table at Trinity College is sometimes worth £200 a year to him or her who has the clearing of it. Next in size to Trinity is St. John's; and these two monopolize more than half of the students, as Christ's Church, Oxford, one-third of the Oxonians.

Gradations of rank, like the four Indian castes, prevail in both Universities. In Cambridge it is: 1. Fellow Commoners—noblemen and rich gentlemen, who have the privilege of dining at the Fellows' table, and wear gold trappings on their gowns, and gold tassels on their caps; or, if they chose to wear hats, they may. 2. Pensioners—who receive no pension, like State pensioners, but pay for all in less expensive style than the former. 3. Scholars—who are elected on the foundation, and have various emoluments, according to the value of the scholarship. 4. Sizars—who have commons free, and dine on the remnants of the Fellows' table. In Oxford, the four castes are Noblemen, Gentlemen-Commoners, Commoners, and Servitors.

Education at the Universities consists, for the most part, of private tutorship. Each student attends the class-room of a tutor, either in college or out of it, and reads with him as at school; and there are public examinations, at which he has opportunities of displaying his abilities and the progress he has made. There are also public lectures, which he may or may not attend, according to his professional intentions. Every facility is afforded to the industrious, and every encouragement to the talented and the ingenious; and the associations of a university residence are most inspiring, for those who are susceptible of inspiration. The names and the images of the great surround him at every step; their memories are everywhere hallowed. The very mulberry tree that Milton planted with his own hands, in the garden of Christ's College, Cambridge, is carefully preserved, propped up, and the excoriated parts covered with sheet lead.

JONATHAN EDWARDS' STUDY.

Peculiar associations of thought, and emotions of veneration, arose when introduced to the book-case, the consulting, octagonal, revolving table, and the old leaf chair, of this eminent divine. They were in the house of Mrs. Cowles, relict of the Rev. Pitkin Cowles, formerly pastor of the church in North Canaan, Ct. The plain cherry and sliding pannels of the book-case bore the marks of the utmost simplicity, as designed not at all for ornament, but for convenience, utility, and the safe keeping of his library. This, of course, I saw not, but presumed his volumes showed no special elegance of binding, being made and used altogether for their contents, as were the dark, closed shelves where they stood. No doubt he needed no glazed shutters to look through, to see where to find any author he desired to consult, as each must have held his own assigned place. Looking at the table and chair, I soliloquized thus: "Here was the book emphatically searched; and here the famous Arminians, of the olden times, Tindal, Taylor, Chubb, &c., were handled with the metaphysician's vigorous grasp, as he pursued his 'Humble Inquiry concerning the Freedom of the Will,' and prepared his 'Treatise on Original Sin;' and here he assayed the great work of writing 'The History of Redemption.' Here moved the pen, to send out to the world the thoughts of a mighty mind, to establish and vindicate the faith once delivered to the saints, and beat assailants from the citadel of truth. Here were labors performed for the church, which will transmit a powerful, beneficent influence through successive generations, to the end of time."

Protestantism forbids idolatrous homage to any departed servants of Christ, however eminent; but who that justly appreciates the character and labors of Edwards, in raising such strong bulwarks against the assaults of error, can view without some instinctive feeling of awe, even the simple, modest memorials of his intellectual and theological toils, transferring our imaginations to the scenes and very places and objects where they were performed? We have no relics for superstitious regard, nor places toward which to go on pilgrimage, but we revere objects that, in sensible form, most strongly bring our minds into intimate, life-like contact with the great and the good. [Puritan Recorder.

MORNING AND EVENING WALKS.

Some thirty-five years ago, a young man who resided in a country district in England was visiting at a distance from home. Newly acquired feelings of piety, gave him a taste for early rising, and for enjoying his books in the private country walks around the house of his friend. Most generally he was wont to bend his steps towards a wood belonging to a neighbor in the vicinity. Soon after commencing these rambles, he was one morning quietly advancing in a winding path, when he found himself suddenly confronted with one of the gamekeepers, who, springing from behind some trees, and supposing the wanderer to be in quest of game, presented a gun at his breast, at the same time telling him that he was a dead man, if he did not stand still and surrender. At the first moment he was somewhat startled, but soon recovering himself, he said that his only object in coming there was to enjoy privacy with his books. The keeper, not being quite satisfied, first demanded his address, and then a sight of his books. He immediately took a small Bible out of his coat pocket. The keeper appeared surprised; and after having entered into conversation with him, told him to consider himself safe at all times on every part of the property.

The next three or four mornings our friend went in a different direction, but afterwards, determining to resume his favorite walk, he met the nobleman's servant at the same point, who, addressing him respectfully, begged of him, if it were not asking too much, to read a chapter out of the Bible, and to explain it to him; adding, that he had waited there two hours each morning since the first meeting, greatly fearing he should never see him there again. The request was gladly complied with. The youthful Christian, now unexpectedly led by circumstances to assume the character of an instructor, became much interested in the man, and frequently resorted to the spot, where he was sure to find him anxiously awaiting his arrival. These interviews were not in vain.

In the course of the next summer, a younger sister of this young man was a visitor in the same family. One Sunday, after the services of the day were ended, she accompanied a young lady of the household in a walk round a sheet of water, and before they were aware, lured on by the calm loveliness of the evening, and the sylvan beauty of the scenery, they had extended their wanderings into a part of the adjoining wood, when their attention was arrested by the music of voices blending in a song of praise. Following in the direction whence the sound proceeded, they at length came to a small, but neat cottage, and, on listening, recognized the words of a hymn. They retired without interrupting the solemn exercises of family devotion; and when they mentioned the circumstances to the brother, who had now entered on preparation for the ministry, his countenance beamed with pleasure, as he rejoined, "It was the keeper's family you heard singing, and he is my first convert." "THE WATER OF LIFE."

Some time since, an incident related in my presence, by a clergyman who had formerly resided at the South, interested me exceedingly. It illustrated very beautifully the freeness of salvation, and also that text of Scripture, "The wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein."

The incident related to a poor negro slave, who had felt the burden of sin, and who had sought and found relief. The precise language of the clergyman, in relating the incident, I do not remember, but the following is the purport thereof:

The poor negro had gone sad and mournful for many a day. He felt a burden upon his heart, heavy like a stone, but he spoke to no one about it. He knew something should be done, but what he could hardly tell. One morning he resolved to fast. At noon, when others went for their food, he repaired to a lonely place near by, where was a spring of water, partly to quench his thirst, and partly to be alone. He stood by the spring of water, his eyes cast down to the ground, and his heart well nigh breaking in sadness. Now he stoops and partakes of the flowing stream. Just then the thought flashes upon him, that "the water of life" is as free as that. He turns his eye of faith to Jesus, and says, "Lord, I will drink of the water that thou givest." He drank, and he was happy.

In connection with this I will cite another case. It is not now of a poor negro slave; it is of the gifted, the strong-minded, the romantic, the hitherto proud-spirited "Charlotte Elizabeth." Let her own words tell us how she received the gospel.

She says, speaking of the gospel and her reception of it, "I took it simply from the Bible, in the words that God's wisdom teacheth, and I thus argued: Jesus came into the world to save sinners; I am a sinner; I want to be saved; he will save me. There is no presumption in taking God at his word; not to do so is very impertinent; I did it, and I was happy."

EARTH'S BROKEN CISTERNS.

We have seen a young man discontented and unhappy, because delayed in entering upon his inheritance; and we have seen the same man, with his desire gratified, with wealth in possession, and yet never so guilty, so wretched, so wholly disappointed, as then. He had come thristing to the cistern, and found it broken. It is an every day tale. Earth is full of promises, but they are broken promises. When the California gold fields were discovered, the intensity of desire to visit them became a monomania with thousands. Happiness was within their reach. They built castles in the air. In the result, the large majority were sadly disappointed. They suffered unheard of privations; they perished by sickness, from utter neglect; they rushed into reckless dissipation; they were murdered! Australia's still richer gold fields have attracted their thousands too, and when they grasp the glittering prize, robbers and murderers step forth to murder them in open day for the sake of the coveted dust. Gold never yet made a man happy; it much oftener unmakes men than makes them. The Island of Madeira should be a merry place, for it is a land of the vine; but the clusters have failed, and the inhabitants are starving. Honesty in lawful business, contentment with the allotments of Providence, enjoying this world in the fear of God, and in expectation of a better, are sources of real comfort, which we recommend our readers to try. AN INCIDENT.

Embarking at Memphis last year there was a sick man lying at the wharf-boat, to whom none gave a cent except Mr. H——, a minister of the N. S. Presbyterian order, and one other.

There was a passenger on board who declaimed loudly, wherever he could get an audience, against religion and religionists, and more especially religion mongers, alias preachers. I bore it as patiently as I could until the second night, and then my impatience found vent. I silenced the gentleman, for that night at least, by observing, "'Tis true that some Christians are hypocrites, and some ministers are speculators in their religion. But as we came on board together you noticed that sick man on the wharf-boat?"

"Yes, I saw him."

"You gave him nothing?"

"No."

"There were more than fifty of our passengers who saw him, and not one of them gave him a dime."

"That is true, I believe."

"Well, sir, the Rev. Mr. H——, who has just gone to bed, has a salary for preaching of about fifty dollars a year; at any rate he has to teach school to make out a support. Now, sir, that man gave the poor fellow two dollars, for I saw it, and I will be his security that he will lay down dollar for dollar with you to any poor fellow you will pick up!"

The fool was answered according to his folly.

I'M GLAD HE IS DONE.—So exclaimed one, as the preacher closed his sermon of about half an hour, and that was the usual length of his discourses. In these days of haste, a sermon of forty-five minutes is considered tedious; and an hour is intolerable. It was not so formerly. Our ancestors had very different notions. Baillie, in describing a meeting held by an assembly of divines in 1643, says:

"We spent from nine to five graciously. After Dr. Twisse had begun with a brief prayer, Mr. Marshall prayed large two hours, most divinely confessing the sins of the Assembly, in a wonderful, prudent, and pathetic way. After, Mr. Arrowsmth preached an hour—then a psalm; thereafter, Mr. Vines prayed near two hours, and Mr. Palmer preached an hour, and Mr. Seamen prayed near two hours—then a psalm; after, Mr. Henderson brought them to a sweet conference of the heat confessed in the assembly, and other seen faults to be remedied, and the conveniency to preach against all sects, especially Anabaptists and Antinomians. Dr. Twisse closed with a short prayer and blessing."

REGENERATION.

In the Recorder of Jan. 13, appeared a communication from "A Young Teacher," requesting our views on the subject of Regeneration, in which it was said, that "some hold to the opinion that it is a work which we bring about in ourselves; that is, when we resolve in our hearts to do the will of God, we are regenerate. Others believe that it is a work which God has to bring about in us."

Our reply was simply a quotation of three passages of Scripture, which we supposed to be applicable to the case. But "An Old Teacher" has sent us a communication, in which he complains of our reply as being "quite too much one sided;" and he says, "It made me think of a few lines of poetry which I saw [invented?] many years ago, which read as follows:—

> There is a misfortune, prevails with mankind,
> Of fixing the Scriptures to suit their own mind.
> They first get their tenets, then make it their care
> To pick out such scriptures as best will compare;
> And when they have such as suit them the best,
> They wrongly construe them, and skip all the rest;—
> And, by such like measures, there is scarcely a man
> But thus might find scripture to suit his own plan."

As we do not care about holding any controversy with our correspondent, many parts of whose communication have but a remote, if any, bearing on the subject, it is sufficient to say, that the conclusion to which he arrives is, "that Regeneration is not brought about by the work of God alone, nor by the work of man alone; but that it cannot be brought about, consistently with the character and attributes of God, and the relation that man bears to him, without the conjoined action of both parties."

At present, we shall content ourselves with a simple statement of our views. If any one wishes to take us to task afterwards, let him confine himself to what we have written, and its necessary logical consequences.

When the Scriptures represent the natural man as "dead in trespasses and sins," we believe they mean just what they say, namely, that there is no life in him. For "he that hath not the Son of God hath not life" 1 John 5: 12. Life, in this connection, is but another term for holiness; the natural man possesses not a particle of it. "Every imagination of the thoughts of his heart is only evil continually." Gen. 6: 5. He is flesh, and not spirit; for "that which is born of the flesh is flesh." John 3: 6. His mind is "the carnal mind," and that is declared to be "enmity against God." Rom. 8: 7. Being "in the flesh," he "cannot please God." Being an unbeliever, he cannot please him, for "without faith it is impossible to please him." Heb. 11: 6.

Now, when a man is regenerate, we understand that he is no longer "dead," but "is passed from death unto life." John 5: 24. We understand that his quickening was of God. Eph. 2: 1, 5. We do not believe that he quickened himself, nor is it so taught in the Scriptures. Nothing can exceed the limits of its own nature in acting. A beast cannot act like a man, unless he be first made to partake of the human nature; he must act like himself, that is, like a beast, and like a beast only. A man cannot act like an angel, without first partaking of the angelic nature. So neither can the carnal man act spiritually, without first partaking of the new or spiritual nature. He acts only as a sinful man. His works are the works of the flesh, and nothing else. God is not in all his thoughts. So Jesus Christ taught, when he said, "A corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit." But if the natural man regenerates himself, he exceeds the limits of his own nature; he acts contrary to the ruling inclination of his heart, which is a contradiction.

Nor do we believe that his quickening is partly of himself and partly of God; it is wholly of Him who is rich in mercy. The notion that it is "the conjoined action of both parties," grows out of confounding the results or fruits of quickening with the quickening itself. This is a very common error. If the natural man partly quickens himself, we have the same difficulty, substantially, as when we suppose him to do the whole work. If the entire power employed in quickening him be represented by the number twenty, and the man himself be supposed to put forth ten of those twenty degrees of power, he exceeds the limits of his own depraved nature in acting, by ten degrees. The absurdity, therefore, though not so extensive as in the case first supposed, is nevertheless the same in kind.

Some think that a man is not regenerate, or begotten again to newness of life, till he finds peace in resting his soul on Jesus Chsist. This is an error. As soon as one begins to long after God—as soon as he really and truly wishes to be a Christian—as soon as he begins ceasing to do evil, and learning to do well—he is already a new creature, whether he experiences any of the comfort of it, or not. These longings of his heart, and sincere efforts at well doing, are the same fruits of the the new birth; they are not the exercises of "the old man which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts." They are the exercises of one actually created anew in Christ. True, it may be a long time before he obtains those clear views of the way of salvation which will enable him to "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory;" nevertheless, he is as truly regenerate as though he were free from all doubts and misgivings. But because, between the time of his illumination to see himself a lost sinner, and his clear discovery of the way of mercy, considerable time usually elapses, during which he is endeavoring to "make his calling and election sure;" and because his endeavors in this line are so many coöperations with God in the work of grace upon his soul; he fancies that he is doing something to regenerate himself, which he supposes will be accomplished when he has found peace; whereas, if he did but know it, he is regenerate already.

Once more. There is no middle ground between death and life; no middle ground between absolute unbelief and faith. The natural man is an unbeliever; the spiritual man is a believer. He believes the very moment he is born again. He has faith, long before he enjoys the comforts of it. All the longings of his heart are after God; and if that does not imply faith in God, we know not what does. The yearnings of the new-born soul are after Christ, and he will no more be satisfied till he rests joyfully in the arms of Christ, than will a new-born infant be satisfied with anything short of the mother's breast. This is faith; not faith in its full strength, it is true, but faith in its lowest degrees, nevertheless genuine faith. For it is certainly that which pleases God; but "without faith it is impossible to please him."

Is faith the act of the natural man? The Apostle tells us that faith is a fruit of the Spirit. Gal. 5: 22. Compare Eph. 2: 8. Again he tells us, that those who exercise faith, do so "according to the working of his (God's) mighty power, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead." Eph. 1: 19, 20. Which means, if we understand it, that it requires the same exertion of divine power to quicken a dead sinner to the exercise of faith, as it did to quicken the dead body of Jesus Christ, and raise it from the grave.

Sunday Opening of the Crystal Palace—The Madiai.

GLASGOW, April 1st, 1853.

The question as to the Sunday opening of the Crystal Palace, still engages deeply the attention of the church which makes void the Sabbath law that it may keep its own traditions—while protesting against all other traditions observed by others. Our imperfectly reformed Protestant people see not that the loss of legal protection for their own day would afford more clear opportunity for the exercise and display of a faith laying hold on God's day. The passing through the House of Commons of the Crystal Palace Railway Bill, without a clause being inserted authorizing the opening of the Palace itself on Sundays, was regarded by such with great complacency. This, however, is not, in reality, the determining point; the repeal of the Act of Parliament 21 Geo. III. c. 49, would be necessary to enable the Palace Company to make a charge for Sunday admission. With the law as it is, it may be inferred from the statements of the Crown lawyers, the exhibition of the whole collection could be made gratuitously. This, of course, is not the design of the Company, whose shareholders expect a large per centage on their invested capital; and towards which, they well know, a Sunday exhibition would, in the present state of public opinion, greatly contribute. This, the Sunday observers also know, and with alarm, and urgency for petitions, the Rev. J. T. Baylee, Clerical Secretary to the London Sunday Observance Society, writes in yesterday's Record, that he has good authority for stating, that an Honorable Member of the House of Commons does propose bringing in a Bill for the repeal of the Act referred to, unless overwhelming petitions should show that public opinion is against such a proposal.

A week ago, a great meeting, (called without placard or newspaper advertisement,) was held in the London Tavern, in favor of the Sunday opening of the Palace—Robert C. Bland, Esq., in the chair. The large room, in which, the preceding week, a meeting for the very opposite purpose was held, was full; and the chairman stated that 200 letters had been received from the working classes in various parts of the country, favorable to the object of the meeting. Mr. Newton moved, "That, in the opinion of this meeting, the opening of the Crystal Palace on Sundays would be a religious, a moral, and a social advantage to the country." In his speech, Mr. N. said there were a greater number of persons attending to the comforts of the dignitaries of the church on Sundays, than would be required to give accommodation to the hundreds of thousands who would visit the Palace on that day. Mr. C. F. Nichols, in seconding the resolution, "contended that the Christian Sabbath was not the Sabbath referred to in the Fourth Commandment. The Christian church thought proper, for its own reasons, to change the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week; and what ever blame there was in the matter, rested with Christendom, for sanctioning such a change." At the close of Mr. N.'s speech, the chairman intimated that discussion was invited. Two individuals availed themselves of the opportunity thus afforded, but neither of them ventured a word in reply to the argument just quoted. An amendment was, however, proposed, but the resolution was carried by a very large majority, and a petition to the House of Commons was directed to be prepared in accordance therewith, which Lord John Russell should be requested to present.

Often as the Church has been reminded that their own practice largely violates the requirements of the Fourth Commandment, even on the supposition that the first day is sanctified thereby, yet luxury and pride are often found too powerful to be thus influenced. The Scotsman this week remarks on the number of carriages which were at the door of Dr. Candlish's church last Sunday, unrebuked, it supposes, and the number of horses, drivers, grooms, and other attendants thereby required to work, for no sufficient reason. But the Dr. himself, it is added, in his zeal against Sunday Railway traveling, had bought one share of the Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee Railway stock, that he might be privileged, at the meetings of the Company, with the opportunity of reminding the shareholders that there is a Fourth Commandment, and to assert that it speaks of the sanctifying of the first day of the week,—which it seems remarkable that he can continue to believe to be true.

The Madiai remain, meanwhile, at Marseilles, the state of their health requiring repose. They have been a few times at the Protestant worship, and have been visited by the British Consul and almost all the English residents in the city. They were expected soon at Paris, and arrangements seem to have been made for a deputation from the British and Foreign Bible Society to receive them there, and to offer their assistance and encouragement. Their sympathizing friends on the spot wisely, however, discourage any prominent display being made at present, although their hotel is constantly crowded by visitors. Their own state of feeling is happily such as becomes godliness. They were released, it appears, on their personally petitioning. The dignity of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, is thus preserved, and his clemency is magnified. He yielded not to the requests of combined Protestantism, nor to the persuasions of nobles, and princes, and potentates; but he listened to the prayer of the prisoners, who had offended him by praying to God and not to the Virgin and other of the Duke's saintly mediators! Will the Duke also hear and answer the prayers of thirty more confined in his prisons, charged with the crime of reading and believing God's most blessed Word? We trust they will continue to be remembered at the throne of grace. The Tuscan Government were either ashamed or afraid. They secretly brought the prisoners from their cells, pushed them from their dominions under a false name (the maiden name of Rosa having been put upon the passport of both instead of Madiai,) and hurried them on board the steamer for Marseilles twenty-four hours before her time of sailing, keeping them secluded till the vessel had left the shore, although poor Francesco was delirious during the night of this confinement. May the Lord, in His love, comfort their hearts, and bless to the good of others the witness they have borne to His name!

After all the coquetting of the French Emperor with Pope and priests, and after all the concessions he has made, in currying favor with both, his coronation is postponed till August. More power and farther means of Protestant persecution are very likely to be required by the mis-called Vicar of Christ—and probably yielded to him—as compensation for the anointing. Is the oil prepared by any authority giving to it either virtue or value? No reason is there to believe that the Emperor has even superstition to believe this.

MISSION OF YOUTHFUL SABBATH-KEEPERS—NO. 2.

4. Your mission, in common with others, reaches beyond the points we have already mentioned, growing naturally out of them, but possessing a broader and more individual scope. Philanthropy demands universal good will—love for every human being, irrespective of the accidental circumstances of sect, party, or nation, birth or station, clime or color. This demand makes the world the mission-field of every individual. There was a time when it could not have been said, in as true and full a sense as now, that the world is the mission-field of every one. Science, and the arts of peace, had not exerted their harmonizing, refining, and generalizing power—the religion of Christ had not shed its benign influence upon the pathway of man. Then a man could not exert an influence much beyond his immediate circle, city, or tribe—when an inhabitant of Troy or Athens, of Meroe or Utica, could not expect to be heard much beyond the walls of his city, unless thrown by chances of war before other nations.

But now no pent up city, or tribe, or nation, contracts the powers of individual man. Drilling for combat, and marshaling of armies, are not the every day business of life. The clangor of arms, and martial strains, are not the sole peans ascending from the earth. The keels of commerce are plowing thick and rapid furrows through every sea. Trade is binding nations together with the golden chain of wealth. Steam is driving locomotives into every nook and corner of the earth—their warm hearts boiling with love for human weal. Electricity is darting thought round about us in every direction, charging, enlightening, and energizing minds. Science and religion are elevating, purifying and fraternizing mankind. A chord of humanity touched now, vibrates much longer than formerly, and its influences are felt much farther. Individualism has assumed much more of the general, ubiquitous nature. There is a greater generalizing of sentiments and aims—a oneness of pulsation of the common heart of humanity—a more universal grasping after a higher destiny.

In fulfilling your mission, you are to have a corresponding ubiquity of thought, feeling, and action. Belonging to humanity, you have a common interest in everything that appertains to humanity. Ignorance, superstition, suffering, and misery, wherever found, con- [illegible] and alleviate. A common brotherhood demands that your sympathies and endeavors should not be fettered by party or sectional views or feelings. In your activities, you must know no bounds but the eternal limits of right and truth; but where truth and right point the way, there you are to follow, regardless of consequences. Your hearts must beat with, and as a part of, the great heart of humanity. The good of universal being must ever be your motto. Wherever your lot is cast, from that spot, as a centre, you are to work outward, striving to agitate the vast ocean of mind that surrounds you; or, like luminous orbs, sending off the pure rays of truth, which, mingling with the rays from similar orbs, shall form one vast flood of light, sweeping over and illuminating the remotest and darkest portions of the earth.

The divisions of which we have thus spoken are some of the grand departments in the common mission of humanity. These departments are not opposed to each other, but occupy affiliated or concentric relations—relations that require us to work from the common centre outward.

Passing from these, we enter a division, underlying, enveloping, and transcending all others. This is the religious. Whatever department may be your more especial field of labor in the others, in this there will ever be duties most important and imperative. Here rest the final interests of humanity. Around the cross of Christ cluster the hopes of a fallen world. The scheme of man's redemption was prompted by infinite love, and devised by infinite wisdom. In carrying forward this plan of salvation, human agency is demanded. You have a part in this great mission. After making it the living, practical principle of your own lives, it becomes your duty to labor in making it the living, practical principle of the world. The church is the great organization through which this is effected. All of its benevolent plans for the evangelization of the world call upon you for assistance—the follies, the sins, and the woes of man, call for the catholicon, that is for the healing of the nations—spiritual death calls upon you for the bread of life—God calls upon you to work for Him in carrying forward the great plan of salvation.

In answering these calls, these demands, the line of duty will often be found running counter to our natural inclinations—opposing our worldly interests—and even bringing us into collision with the religious beliefs and practices of others. Our mission as Christians may affect more or less all of our other relations in life. Passing over the points common to the mission of every Christian, as a Christian, every one has, in addition to these common duties, a definite mission to fulfill—a part to perform, assigned him by an overruling and guiding Providence. The same holds true of Societies and Denominations.

What, then, is the peculiar and special mission of Seventh-day Baptists?

We reply, that as it was the mission of Moses, descending from the Mount, his face radiant with heavenly glory, to deliver the Law of God unbroken to the world, so it is our especial mission to take our stand by that same Law, and proclaim it, unbroken, unabrogated, to the world. Submitting to the requirements of the unchanging, eternal Law of God, it is our duty to persuade mankind to submit to these same universal requirements. While there are other truths clustering around and intimately connected with it, this is the central truth—fundamental idea—on which rests our peculiar work. This places us in opposition, both in belief and in practice, to the entire evangelical world. The opposition is such, that if we are right, those that oppose us are wrong, and if they are right, we are wrong. There is no middle ground. In this difference we take the Bible as umpire, being willing, and even anxious, to bring all questions of dispute to it for decision. To it we make our ultimate appeal. Here, then, is our point of contest—our battle-field. It is not a social, political, scientific, or mercenary warfare, but it is a moral and religious contest.

There are many and important inconveniences, difficulties, and sacrifices, arising from our religious differences, but these can never be removed until the cause is removed. It will be our next object to notice some of these points of inconvenience and sacrifice, attaching particularly and inseparably to our position and relations as Sabbath-keepers.

In the early ages of the church, it was truly a great cross to become a Christian. The church was but small, and composed, not of the learned and great of the earth, but of the poor and ignorant. As it grew and spread abroad, it became the subject of most bitter and deadly persecutions. In such times it cost something to be a Christian. But at the present day it is quite different. In most enlightened countries, its principles are respected and popular. In some, the church is made the high-way to preferment—to social and political standing and influence. Although there is in our own country no legislative union of Church and State, yet some denominations have become so popular—so many great names are connected with them—that it is considered an honor, in a worldly point of view, to belong to them. In many instances, the surest road to success in the world, is for a young man to unite himself with one of these leading denominations. By so doing, and at the same time maintaining a becoming moral deportment, he can secure the favor and aid of men of business and influence. By their assistance he is introduced to situations in the commercial, political, or literary world, and has channels of success opened to him, that he might not have found after long years of toil, without such membership. Let, for instance, an aspiring young man, of pleasing exterior and insinuating address, unite himself with some of the most popular churches of our great cities, and he is immediately brought into brotherly relations with some of the most rich commercial houses—some of the most powerful social and literary influences, of the land—relations which he may use very much to his advantage. But, how is it with those becoming members of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination?

We will endeavor to answer this question in our next.

MACOM.

JOHN HOWARD A BAPTIST.

The question of the denominational sympathies of John Howard has been raised and discussed in some of the religious papers of England. That he was a Baptist in sentiment there is no doubt, and it has been supposed by some that he was much interested in the subject of the Sabbath. Drs. Joseph and Samuel Stennett, who were Sabbath-keepers, and at the same time served as pastors of the Baptist Church worshiping in Little Wild Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, were very intimate and much esteemed friends of Mr. Howard, and he was a regular attendant upon their ministry when in London. Dr. Samuel Stennett preached a sermon on the occasion of Mr. Howard's death, from the text, Acts 10: 38—"Who went about doing good." In his introduction, Mr. Stennett says:—

"It is a sad providence that directs my attention to these words—words so descriptive of the character to which I mean to accommodate them, that the name of Howard scarce need be mentioned to inform you whom I intend. To raise a monument to his memory is not my object. It does not require it, nor am I equal to the service. The obligations, however, I owe to his friendship and your edification, will not allow me to be silent. His benevolent regards to this Christian Society, his regular attendance with us for many years past, as opportunity permitted; the satisfaction he expressed in the word here preached; and the particular share I had in his affectionate esteem; are all considerations which will, I hope, secure me from the imputation of vanity, in thus taking notice of so public a character."

After a succinct statement of some of Mr. Howard's characteristic excellencies, the preacher continues:—

"Such were the moral endowments of this extraordinary man, such his fortitude, his humanity, his disinterestedness, and temperance. I go on now to speak of his religious character. He was a firm believer of divine revelation. Nor was he ashamed of those truths he heard stated, explained, and enforced in this place. He had made up his mind, as he said, upon his religious sentiments, and was not to be moved from his steadfastness by novel opinions obtrued on the world. Nor did he content himself with a bare profession of these divine truths. He entered into the spirit of the gospel, felt its power, and tasted its sweetness. You know, my friends, with what seriousness and devotion he attended, for a long course of years, on the worship of God among us. It would be scarce decent for me to repeat the affectionate things he says, in a letter writ me from a remote part of the world, respecting the satisfaction and pleasure he had felt in the religious exercises of this place. I shall, however, be excused, if I just observe, that his hours of religious retirement, whether on land or at sea, were employed in reviewing the notes he had taken of sermons delivered here. 'And these,' he adds, 'are my songs in the house of my pilgrimage. Oh, sir, how many Sabbaths have I ardently longed to spend in Wild Street! God in Christ is my rock, the portion of my soul.'"

THE LADIES FOR TEMPERANCE.

An exchange gives the particulars of a temperance movement, which shows what can be done by perseverance on the part of the ladies. It seems that at Markland, Ohio, a little girl about twelve years old obtained to her list of temperance pledges more than five hundred names. This set the ball rolling among the men and women of the place. The result was the union of the ministers and lawyers, of all sects in religion, and of all parties in politics, to roll on the temperance car, and keep it on the track. The men organized societies, and the ladies united their own sex in similar organizations, holding their female temperance meetings, and conducting them upon their own responsibility. A committee of two ladies, from one of their societies, has recently waited upon all the merchants, grocers and taverns of the place, selling ardent spirits, eleven in number, and asked their names to a pledge not to sell ardent spirits, except for medicinal or chemical purposes. All signed the pledge, except two grocers, who wanted "more time for consideration." The ladies have great confidence that the two "considering" gentlemen will yet yield to their request, and sign the pledge. Most of the citizens of the town have signed a petition to the Legislature of Ohio to give them the Maine Liquor Law.

THE KEY TO THE CABIN.—Mrs. Stowe's "Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin" has at length made its appearance. It claims to present the "Original Facts and Documents, upon which the story is founded," together with sundry "corroborative statements, verifying the truth of the work." The work is destined to have a wide circulation, and may possible do as much to create anti-slavery sentiment as the original work. It is a pamphlet of 262 large octavo pages, and is sold for 50 cents. Over 60,000 copies are already ordered. A Southern Baptist paper speaks thus in relation to it:—

"Mrs. Stowe's second book will consolidate the fortune gathered by the first. But it will have a different reception from that of the first. It claims to be a book of facts. It will provoke rejoinders as such. As such it will receive the most searching investigation. If its statements cannot endure the test, the bubble reputation, which she now enjoys, will break even more rapidly than it was blown. If its statements are true, some of our people may look into the logic of her conclusions, and may undertake to show what the same kind of reasoning proves with regard to the North."

REVIVAL AT TROUPSBURGH, N. Y.—A letter from Bro. Charles Card, dated April 3, says: "It appears to be a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord in Troupsburgh. It began in a prayer circle of three or four, and has increased for about four weeks, and still appears to be progressing. Eternity alone can reveal the extent of the work. It belongs to no particular denomination, as there is a mixture of four or five denominations."

AN "ELOQUENT PRAYER."—California is a great country, undoubtedly; and they have original ways of saying and doing almost every thing there. Here is a specimen.

On the 4th of March, 1853, twenty-two Senators of California signed the following request to Rev. Sylvester Woodbridge, Jr.:—

"Dear Sir—The undersigned would respectfully ask a copy of the eloquent prayer delivered by you in the Senate Chamber this morning, with the privilege that they may give it that publication which its merits justly demand."

To which request Mr. Woodbridge replied:—

"Gentlemen—I have the honor to submit a copy of the prayer offered in the Senate Chamber this morning, believing that the day and theme will induce your kindness—as I trust the sincerity of the oblation will the Omnipotent Being to whom it was addressed—to overlook its demerits."

A YEAR'S WORK.—Uncle Tom is now one year old. On the 20th of March, 1852, John P. Jewett & Co. sold the first copy of the first edition. On the 20th of March, 1853, they had published 305,000 copies, or—as only about 300 business days had transpired—they had sold (at the ordinary book-rate of one thousand copies to an edition) an edition a day for that entire period. Sufficiently remarkable as this may appear, we learn from them—what is more remarkable still—that the demand continues without sensible abatement; nearly as many copies having been sold during the past month, as in any other month in the year. The work is now selling largely at the South, and constant orders are coming in from all parts of the world, Oregon, California, and Australia not excepted. The last foreign mail brought an order for the illustrated edition from Persia! So says the Congregationalist.

AN AGED MISSIONARY.—The Puritan Recorder says that Rev. Charles Cleaveland, the Boston city missionary of Congregationalists, has attended, with the assistance of his wife, to no less than two thousand four hundred and eighty-four cases of poverty and want during the past year; and has applied for their relief, from the private benefactions committed to his disposal, the sum of one thousand two hundred and seventy dollars. "Father Cleaveland," adds the Recorder, "being his own voluntary society, very naturally makes his official year coincident with that of his natural life; and in the beginning of his report, he says: 'In the enjoyment of perfect health,—with a heart overflowing with gratitude to the Father of mercies,—and with an enlarged attachment to my high and holy calling,—I have this day entered upon the eighty-first year of my pilgrimage.'"

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH-BUILDING FUND.—The fifty thousand dollars which the Congregational Convention at Albany proposed to raise, to assist in building churches at the West, has been secured. The Central Committee have officially announced the fact, and state that they have caused to be prepared, by competent architects, about a dozen plans of churches. "Those plans are now in the hands of engravers and printers, and will be published in a folio volume, accompanied by some general suggestions in regard to the building of churches, at the earliest practicable moment. They may be expected by the close of the month of May. The plans will embrace designs ranging from the simplest and cheapest village chapel or lecture-room, to the larger, more elaborate and expensive structure adapted to the wealth and wants of the city."

AN APPEAL TO ARITHMETIC.—One who is accustomed to make pretty correct calculations, thinks there is no just ground for complaint about the expense of maintaining the preaching of the gospel. He cyphers it out in this way:—

"I have," says he, "a family of six persons, who attend church. I pay $24 a year for pew rent. I hear two sermons on the Sabbath, and one during the week, making one hundred and fifty 'lectures' during the year. I obtain, therefore, for myself and family, nine hundred lectures for $24! or, in other words, I pay about two and a half cents a lecture. People give from twenty-five to fifty cents a lecture on astronomy, and almost every subject you can name, except the gospel. Surely, for a 'gospel lecture' I ought to be willing to give at least two cents and a half!"

COMFORT FOR EDITORS.—Daniel DeFoe, the eminent writer, speaks thus in regard to the position and prospects of independent writers:—

"If I might give a short hint to an impartial writer, it would be to tell his fate. If he resolves to venture upon the dangerous precipice of telling unbiased truth, let him proclaim war with mankind—neither to give nor to take quarter. If he tells the crimes of great men, they fall upon him with the iron hands of the law. If he tells them of virtues, when they have any, then the mob attacks him with slander. But if he regards truth, let him expect martyrdom on both sides, and then he may go on fearless; and this is the course I take myself."

MR. ONCKEN COMING TO AMERICA.—Rev. J. G. Oncken, the Baptist Missionary or Apostle in Germany, is coming to this country. A letter from him was recently received by the Secretary of the American and Foreign Bible Society, in which he says:

"I have only time to say, that, after most careful consideration, with the consent of the Church, and, I trust, with the approbation of our heavenly Father, I have now resolved to leave Europe about the middle of April, so that, if all is well, I hope to be with you in the beginning of May."

A SIXTY-FOUR YEARS PASTORATE.—On Sunday, Jan. 30, 1853, Rev. Wm. Jay's pastoral connection with the Argyle Chapel, Bristol, Eng., terminated, after a duration of sixty-four years. The fact was affectingly announced by a letter from Mr. Jay, read from the pulpit by the Rev. Mr. Dyer, the minister on the occasion.

General Intelligence.

European News.

European News to April 2d, one week later, has been received.

Sixty-four ships were advertised at Liverpool for Australia.

From Ireland the emigration sets chiefly to America.

The colliers of Glasgow have struck successfully for higher wages, as have also the Liverpool railway clerks and operatives. The movement had extended to Manchester, and would probably go over the country.

The health of the Madiai family is as good as can be expected, after their late sufferings. They are still at Marseilles. They were, however, soon expected at Paris, where they will be met by a deputation of the London Bible Society.

Arrangements are completed by the anti-slavery committee, to give Mrs. Stowe a public reception in Glasgow City Hall. An address will be presented, and a soiree will follow.

The news from the Cape of Good Hope is, that peace had been proclaimed.

Pipo Rich, tried for killing the archbishop of Paris, is acquitted of assassination, but condemned for a share in the insurrection.

There had been an attempt at outbreak by armed peasantry at Sugan, Switzerland, but it was suppressed without conflict by the civil guard.

Matilda Hitzfield, an American lady, was apprehended recently in Germany as an agent of the Revolutionary Committee, and condemned to six weeks' imprisonment.

The Duke of Hesse Darmstadt, alarmed at the emigration from Germany, requests the neighboring potentates to arrest any of his subjects attempting to leave without his permission.

Eighty political refugees were shipped from Genoa for America per steamer Giovanna on the 26th ult.

A telegraphic dispatch from Berlin, Prussia, of the 29th, says a conspiracy had been discovered. Twenty persons were arrested, eighty houses searched, and arms and ammunition found. Eight persons were arrested for wearing the Calaban hat—a revolutionary symbol.

Four Days Later.

The steamship Pacific, with four days later news from Europe, arrived at New York April 17.

A schooner, about 140 tuns, was run down and lost, with all on board, by the Liverpool steamer Minerva, a few miles north of the Isle of Man, on the night of the 29th ult. The accident is attributed to the culpable negligence of the steamer.

Another appalling casualty took place on the afternoon of the 1st instant, in the wreck of the fine iron steamship Duke of Sutherland, trading between London and Aberdeen. On Friday afternoon, the Duke, after a rapid run from London, arrived off the entrance to Aberdeen harbor, where a freshet in the river Dee, meeting the sea-tide and wind inshore, caused a heavy swell, which drove the steamer on the rocks at the head of the breakwater, and in a short time the vessel broke up. The wreck was so close to the shore that with the smallest exertion on the part of those on land all on board might have been saved, but from the grossest stupidity fifteen or twenty persons were suffered to drown in presence of hundreds of lookers on.

A wealthy watchmaker, named Donegan, of Dublin, is sending out to the New York Exhibition a set of superb gold watches, as presents for the Irish political exiles, both those who remain in Van Dieman's Land and those who have escaped to America. The watches are appropriately decorated, and are very valuable.

A slight shock of an earthquake was felt at Portsmouth, between 11 and 12 o'clock, on Friday night, the 1st inst. A private letter mentions it was noticed along the west coast of France.

The Turin Parliament of 29th ult., publishes a list, filling six columns of type, of the names of Lombard exiles whose property is confiscated. The list includes many noble families.

Letters from Bercy state that a fire which broke out there on the 30th, destroyed all the storehouses and 15,000 casks of wine.

According to the police books, 194 Americans arrived in Paris during the month of March, and 944 English.

The End of the Inebriate.

A paragraph appeared in our last paper relative to the death of a Mr. Keeler and wife, of Decatur, Michigan. One of our exchanges brings the following sad particulars, furnished by the father of the deceased:—

Simon O. Keeler, the deceased, was a son of Judge Keeler, and was about thirty-seven years of age. He was a man of good general character, industrious, well educated, and enterprising, and was the owner of a good farm under cultivation, from which he derived his support. At the time of his decease, however, he was residing with his father, upon a farm owned by Judge Keeler. Mrs. Keeler, the wife of Simon O. Keeler, was about thirty years of age, who was also well educated, intelligent, and of excellent moral character, unblemished reputation, correct deportment and refinement.

As a general rule, the utmost affection and confidence prevailed between this couple. The deceased husband, however, was subject at times to excessive drinking, which continued upon him sometimes for weeks together, and which affected his nervous system to a great extent, rendering him almost insane. At such times he was beset with jealousy toward his wife, which rendered him fierce and overbearing in his deportment toward her, and at such times their previous good understanding and affection were replaced by feelings in entire contrast to those of his real nature.

On Friday, March 25, Judge Keeler went from his residence to be gone until Sunday, the 27th, leaving his son and wife the only persons at home. For about three weeks previous to that day, Simon O. Keeler had been constantly indulging to excess in the use of liquor, so much so that his appetite for food had forsaken him.

Before leaving home, Judge Keeler (between whom and his son and wife the strongest affection subsisted) took occasion to admonish his son, that his drinking, if persevered in, would soon lead him to a drunkard's grave. Judge Keeler exhorted him to put his foot down, and promise that he would not drink another drop of liquor until the first day of January, 1854, promising him, in case he would so promise, and knowing from his character that if he so promised he would perform, to give him the free use of the farm, which is well stocked, with a span of horses, wagon and harness, two yoke of working oxen, twenty-five hogs, cows, sheep, &c., and with all necessary farming utensils, and to make him a present beside of hay, provisions, &c., amounting in all to about $500. The son admitted that he was killing himself with liquor, but evaded making the promise desired by his father, and saying, "Well, father, I will think it over, and when you come home we will make it all right." These were the last words ever spoken between them.

Judge Keeler departed upon his business, and the awful tragedy which followed was not witnessed by mortal eye, so far as is known. On Sunday afternoon, Judge Keeler returned to his home, and found the house shut. Failing to arouse the inmates, and with foreboding of evil, he effected entrance into the house, when the first object which met his eye was the corpse of his daughter-in-law, decently disposed upon the floor of the sitting-room, her face bound up with a handkerchief, as if for burial, and the limbs straightened and stiff in death. A pillow was under her head, and by her side were evidences that another person had lain down. She had been shot through the heart. Upon entering the bedroom through the open door, he discovered the body of his son, stiff in death, but distorted and convulsed, as though he had dragged himself in the agony of dying from the side of his wife to the bed which they usually occupied, and had there died in extreme torture. Upon searching for the cause of his death, the father found that a large piece had been shaved off from a lump of opium, and to this agent he attributed the death of his son, though a post-mortem examination failed to give evidence of that or any other positive cause.

Slave-Catching in New Jersey.—The Pennsylvania Freeman gives the particulars of an unsuccessful movement of some "hunters of men" from Virginia. It seems that they went to Trenton, N. J., to capture one Robert Thomas, a respectable colored man, who had resided in Trenton about twenty years, having a wife and family, and property worth $2000 or more. They applied for a warrant to James Ewing, Esq., who had been appointed Commissioner, but he declined to aid them, alleging that he had never accepted the office. This compelled them to resort to Judge Dickerson, at Paterson. Thomas heard what they were up to, and leaving his home and family, he fled to Canada, where he arrived safely, leaving his hunters to digest their chagrin as best they may. But the saddest feature of the story is untold. Mrs. Thomas, a worthy woman, an excellent wife, and a devoted mother, was suffering from feeble health at the time, and she has since died, doubtless a victim to the excitement and grief caused by this outrage; leaving a motherless family of children, some of them quite small. The first tidings to the poor man who is thus driven from his hard-earned and happy home, and his native land, by the Fugitive Law, will be that he is widowed, his children orphaned, and his home left desolate, by that same bereavement.

Mrs. Fillmore.—At the funeral of this estimable lady, the wife of Ex-President Fillmore, the officiating clergyman thus concluded some very appropriate remarks upon the sad occasion:—

"Our departed friend was born at Stillwater, Saratoga Co., N. Y., March 13th, 1798. Her father was Rev. Lemuel Powers, a respectable clergyman of the Baptist communion. Her youth she devoted to teaching; honoring a profession, which also honored her; and in that employment, probably, she took her earlier lessons, so thoroughly learned and so wisely practiced, in self-knowledge and self-culture and control. Thus prepared, in the strength of mature womanhood, she assumed the relations of domestic and conjugal life. As a wife and mother, I forbear to attempt a description of what she was. I may not speak imperfectly, what by some is felt so deeply. Her husband by constant affection and tender confidence praiseth her, and her children by reverent love rise up and call her blessed."

Opera-Houses.—The Legislatures of Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, have abandoned their ancient opposition to dramatic performances, and granted charters under which stockholders can unite, and without incurring risk beyond the amount of their subscriptions, build theaters or opera-houses. The result is beginning to appear. Already the sum of $250,000 has been subscribed for the Boston Opera-house, and the building is to be immediately commenced. In Philadelphia, considerable progress has been made in subscriptions to stock for a house intended to eclipse in magnitude and splendor any now existing. In New York $165,000 has been subscribed to build an opera-house at the corner of Fourteenth-st. and Irving-place, the building of which will be commenced as soon as a further sum of $35,000 is obtained, which the parties who have the matter in hand confidently expect will be immediately.

New York State Legislature.—The Legislature of New York, having spent in fruitless talk the one hundred days for which the constitution authorizes pay, adjourned April 13th, leaving a large amount of important business unfinished. Thereupon the Governor issued a proclamation calling an extra session, to assemble immediately. The principal reason he gives for this course is the failure of the Legislature to make the necessary appropriations for many of the expenses of Government, to pass the annual tax bill of the city of New York, and to act upon grave charges preferred by a Committee of the Assembly against Canal Commissioner Mather.

The Rascal Caught.—We learn from the Detroit Times, of the 5th, that the Sheriff of Kent County, in Canada, together with officer Sprague, on Monday arrested a man, accused of having stolen $2,000 from a colored woman in Chatham. On searching him, they found $1,800 of the money secreted about his person. He was taken across the river, and delivered to Her Majesty's officers, to be sent to Chatham. We are informed that this man formerly owned the woman whom he had robbed, and had sold her on two occasions, while living at the South; that she finally obtained her freedom, and removed to Illinois, where she purchased a small farm, and where he, having become poor in circumstances, came and lived with her as her husband; that to get rid of him, she sold her farm at a large advance on its cost, and removed to Chatham, where he again overtook her, and after living with her a short time she was taken ill, when he robbed her of the money found on him when arrested.

SUMMARY.

The Cincinnati Gazette, of April 10, says: A negro was seen to run down to the river on the Kentucky side, near Jamestown, on Sunday, and jumping into the river, swam over to the Ohio side, landing near Pendleton. After resting himself, (for he was very much fatigued,) he started off for the hills. Shortly after, two white men were seen to ride down to the edge of the river and cross over. They were in pursuit of the negro, who was a runaway slave. They had tracked him to the river, and ascertained he had crossed over. They had chased him from near Alexandria, the county seat of Campbell county.

The Albion, Orleans county, Republican, states that Mr. John Millspaugh had a hair-breadth escape on the Buffalo, Niagara Falls and Rochester Railroad. He had taken a passage on the cars at Lockport for Albion, and was about stepping on the rear car of the train, when he slipped and fell betwen the rails. At the same instant the cars were backed, and the entire train passed over him; and hardly had the locomotive cleared him before the motion was reversed, and again the train ran over his prostrate body. Fortunately, the spot where he lay was unusually depressed, so much so that the cars passed over him without touching, the cow-catcher merely brushing him.

The National Intelligencer publishes a card, signed by Charles Lanman, Benjamin Poor, and George J. Abbott, Esqs., announcing the receipt, by subscription, of eight hundred dollars, for the purchase and emancipation of "Daphne" and child, the wife and daughter of the slave belonging to the late Hon. Daniel Webster, known as "Williams," and who was emancipated by Mr. Webster sometime before his death. The money subscribed for the purchase of the wife and child, has been paid over, and both are now free.

Among the Egyptian curiosities of Dr. Abbott, now exhibiting in New York, are many large blocks of finely sculptured stone. The most beautifully executed of these, representing the return of one of the Pharoahs in triumph from a distant war, dating back nearly 2,000 years before Christ, was obtained and transported at great expense. But after resisting the tooth of time for 3,000 years, and escaping all the perils of Egypt and the ocean, a heedless carman in New York dumped it carelessly on the pavement, breaking it in pieces.

The Director of the U. S. Mint has temporarily suspended the coinage of three cent pieces, with a view to the more active employment of the Mint in the manufacture of other silver coins. Over thirty-six millions of three cents having been put in circulation within two years, it is believed that a suspension of their coinage will cause no public inconvenience, especially as other silver coin will speedily be available for the uses to which the three cent pieces are at present applied.

A dispatch dated Providence, R. I., April 11, says: The British bark Robert Kerr, Moys, of and from Glasgow for New York, with a cargo of iron, was abandoned at sea March 4th, in lat. 40 36, lon. 53 05, in a sinking condition, with five feet of water in her hold, having sprung a leak on the 1st, during heavy weather. All hands, passengers and crew, forty-two in number, were taken off by the British bark Douglass, from New Castle for New York.

Bunker Hill Monument was twice struck by lightning on Wednesday, April 6. Persons who were in the monument thought it was going over. The bottom of one of the rods, where it entered the earth, was slightly melted, and a gentleman near the top, who was passing down and holding by the iron rail, received a shock from which he did not recover entirely for a couple of hours. The second shock sounded like the crash of a large quantity of glass thrown down the inside of the monument.

On the 31st of January, thirty-one vessels arrived in the harbor of San Francisco. During the 24 hours of the 11th, there were thirty arrivals. On the 2d day of March there were eighty-six vessels and steamers, of all descriptions, loading and discharging at their wharves, of which seventeen were ships (four clippers,) eleven barks, sixteen brigs, thirteen schooners, sixteen sloops, and eighteen steamers, of which two were war-steamers.

The contract for constructing the Sault Ste. Marie Canal has been awarded to Erastus Corning, of Albany. His propositions are to complete the Canal for the seven hundred and fifty thousand acres of land appropriated, with the understanding that all taxes shall be remitted, as authorized by the supplement act of the Michigan Legislature last winter. The work is to be completed within two years from signing the contract.

Columbus Smith, Esq., has returned from England, where he has been investigating the claims of the Holts in this country to a large estate left by Chief Justice Holt. He reports that there is a large estate in possession of the Wilsons; but that the genealogy of the Holts in this country cannot be traced back so as to render proof that they are the real heirs, and there is much doubt of their being so. He considers the case settled against the Holts.

The Providence Journal says that the attempt to raise money enough, by subscription, to retain Mr. Webster's estate in the possession of his family, is likely to fail, and that the place will necessarily be sold. It infers that the people of Boston are a good deal more apt at making speeches in honor of Mr. Webster's memory, than in acting in compliance with his expressed desires.

The Binghampton Daily Republican says that Messrs. Campbell, Moody and Bissell, are preparing a large white stick of timber, at Alleghany, for the World's Fair. It is 80 feet long, and squares clear three feet, containing 720 cubic feet, or 7,200 feet of lumber, board measure. It was over five feet diameter on the stump.

At a municipal election in Louisville, Kentucky, last week, a majority of 205 was given in favor of licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors, and a majority of 777 against establishing a city water-works. The Courier seems to think that this vote establishes conclusively, the fact that whiskey is stronger than water.

Three banks in Rhode Island have issued fractional bills in large quantities. In the present dearth of change they are found to be a great convenience, and are very generally welcomed wherever they can be obtained. About four weeks since, one bank issued $30,000 in fractional bills, not a dollar of which has yet been presented at the bank for redemption.

The Oneida Herald says that the Empire and Clayville manufacturing establishments have been purchased by a wealthy company of New York capitalists, among others, Brown, Brothers & Co. The capital of the new company is $250,000. The mills are to be put in operation as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made. The sale was made by the Lewis County Bank. This property originally cost $400,000.

The Joint Committee representing all the Railroads between Albany, Troy and Buffalo, has reported to the General Committee the prices and other terms upon which each stock be consolidated into a new Central Railway Company, and the same have been agreed to. Consolidation may, therefore, now be considered as consummated.

Three of the members of the Legislature of Minnesota were twenty days in reaching their seat of government, being obliged to travel in Esquimaux style, by means of teams of dogs and snow-shoes. Their dogs were employed in drawing their luggage, and they were compelled to walk the whole distance—500 miles.

Some two weeks since a young lady residing in Granby street, Baltimore, had some slight difficulty with a brother, aged about twelve years, in relation to his going to school. He picked up a pair of scissors and stuck the point into the cap of one of her knees. The injury resulted in an inflammation, which terminated her existence.

One day last week, the steamer Union brought to this city, as was supposed, $200,000 in gold dust. But upon opening the boxes, at the Bank where they were deposited, it was discovered that several of them contained nothing but shot and old iron, the gold having been abstracted.

There had been paid to the late Duke of Wellington, for military services to the end of 1851, a little less than a year before his death, £2,613,975, or more than thirteen million dollars, the bare interest on which at 6 per cent. would be $780,000 a year.

In the six theological seminaries of the Old School, the number of students in attendance the present year is considerably less than at the same time last year. In but one seminary has there been an increase of students, that at Alleghany, Pa. The present number of students is 250—the number last year, 267.

An interesting revival is in progress in Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass., and at the Academy in Hinsdale, in Berkshire county. There are also revivals at Carver—the conversions already amounting to fifty—and at North Amherst and Montague.

A correspondent of the Manchester Mirror, writing from Wentworth, N. H., says that for the last eight or ten days there has been a great run of sap, and from present appearances this spring will be more prolific in the manufacture of maple sugar than any season for two or three years past.

A public dinner is to be given to Hon. John P. Hale in Boston, on the 5th of May next, as a testimony of respect for the able and faithful manner in which he discharged the duties of a Senator in Congress during the last six years.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Miscellaneous.

The New Moon.

Oh! I've seen the fair new moon, mother,
  Her cresent crowns the night,
And from its silver horns, mother,
  Streams forth a gentle light.
    Oh! fair is its beam
    On wood and stream,
  Putting all gloom to flight;
And I saw her over my right, mother,
  And I saw her over my right.

On the bridge by the maple path, mother,
  I stood and looked below,
And the rippling waves in the light, mother,
  Shone bright with its silvery glow.
    The song of a bird,
    The calm air stirred,
  Of the tranquil summer night;
And the moon shone over my right, mother,
  And the moon shone over my right.

And I thought of the land of the blest, mother,
  Where the holy spirits dwell,
And their smiles seemed wove with the light, mother,
  Of the moonbeams where they fell;
    And my spirit turned
    Where the fair stars burned,
  With a new and supreme delight;
As the moon shone over my right, mother,
  As the moon shone over my right.

And when I wished my wish, mother,
  Beneath the moon's bright beams;
Strange, strange, that thoughts of earth, mother,
  Should mix with our heavenly dreams;
    I'm not to blame,
    I could but name
  My love in my prayer to-night;
When the moon shines over my right, mother,
  When the moon shines over my right.

Merits of Different Breeds of Sheep.

It is a commonly admitted fact, that fine wool cannot be produced in New England with profit. The income from fine wooled sheep consists almost exclusively in the fleece, and that has fallen below the actual cost of production. In the south and west we have a vast territory, in which wool can be afforded at far less than its present prices.

The cost of keeping sheep in New England cannot be estimated at less than $2, while at the south and west, sheep are pastured during the entire year for a shilling.

Against such odds, even the shrewdness of Yankeedom is impotent. We must retire and leave this field of labor to those who have greater natural advantages. Energy and skill may defer the time, yet it must soon come, when this class of sheep will as certainly pass away from us, as population and the value of our land shall increase. The importation of fine wooled sheep for cultivation here, is misdirected enterprise and capital. Such animals, no matter how large and beautiful, if they have no recommendation but their wool, must take the course of empire westward.

The increase of population, which is driving out our flocks of fine wooled sheep, requires a race of sheep which, in addition to their fleece, shall furnish our population with food. In this business there is now but little competition, and superior mutton commands extravagant prices. The few who have engaged in the breeding of this class of sheep, are reaping a rich pecuniary harvest.

The great majority of farmers are keeping sheep for one and a half dollars per head of annual income. All these ought to know the important secret, that some of us are receiving an annual income of fifteen dollars per head, from sheep costing but a trifle more than theirs, with the exception of the first cost.

With such views, I disposed of all my fine wooled sheep four years since. I had then to select a new stock. The qualities I wished to secure were large size, good constitution, early maturity, and a disposition to increase in flesh and fat.

That I might be able to form an intelligent opinion on the merits of different kinds, I spent considerable time in reading, correspondence, and travel, to become acquainted with the best breeds in this country and in Europe. My impressions concerning a few of these varieties, may be of service to others in a similar position. The first which attracted my attention was the then recently imported

FRENCH MERINO.

This kind of sheep had the desirable qualities of large size and heavy fleece, but there is in this country a prejudice against Merino mutton, which, whether well founded or not, makes it impolitic to breed them for mutton sheep.

There is one other obvious objection to them. On opening their fleece, it appears full of a fluid which is in the form of small, yellowish, shining globules, except near the surface, where it forms with dust, &c., a dark hard crust. This fluid proves to be a natural and constant excretion of the skin of the animal. Such a drain upon the constitution of any animal, would seem unfavorable to their rapid increase. But this excretion proves on analysis to be still worse than it appears, for it is composed largely of animal fat, which is the very substance we wish to retain.

Another circumstance is, that this excretion varies according to the condition of the animal, so that the more highly they are fed, the faster does the fat pass off through the skin.

My conclusion was, that this sheep might be useful where wool was the only object, but that it was not desirable as a mutton sheep.

THE SOUTH DOWN.

This is a beautiful and very distinct variety, and is very successfully grown in this country. When well bred, their constitution is good, the fleece is of medium weight and fineness, they rear fine lambs, and are very superior mutton.

This breed has no fault, and but one deficiency—it does not grow large enough to complete with the LEICESTERS.

This variety of sheep is with many a favorite. There are a few flocks in this country under careful culture, which can scarcely be surpassed. The elegance of their anatomical structure indicates a long course of pure breeding, and perhaps an over degree of refinement.

The system called in-and-in breeding, may be carried too far, and cannot be safely practiced but by judicious selections] by careful and scientific breeders. Purity may be preserved at the expense of weight of fleece, and and strength and vigor of constitution. These remarks are suggested by the appearance of the Leicester sheep in this country.

COTSWOLD.

I have selected this breed of sheep for my own cultivation, as combining more desirable qualities as a mutton sheep, than any other known variety. Its large size removes it from all competition except with the Leicester. Compared with them the appearance of the Cotswold indicates a more recent origin, less refinement of anatomy, less delicacy of style, equal beauty of form, less liability to disease and that greater vigor of constitution given by the fresh blood of a new and rising race.

Some of the best of this breed of sheep, are now known as New Oxfordshires. I am keeping both varieties, and have yet had no reason to regret my selection.

They are prolific. After two years of age they usually bring twins. The lambs become fat, and are worth in autumn five dollars to the butcher. Selected for breeding, the lambs sell at from ten to twenty-five dollars each. A gentleman in Canada, who had fourteen of this class of sheep, informed me that he one year raised from them twenty-eight lambs, and sold them for seven hundred dollars.

Their wool is profitable. The wool of this sheep, compared with the Merino, is dry, clean, and less soft. The staple is very long. No other sheep produce so heavy a fleece of pure wool. Some washed fleeces have weighed as high as twenty pounds. A friend in Virginia informs me that he has sheared from the same sheep, over thirty-seven pounds of clean washed wool in two consecutive years. This wool sells at thirty cents per pound. The lightest fleeces are from bearing ewes, and these will average seven pounds each, so that there is no kind of wool selling higher by the fleece.

These sheep are hardy. I have kept them three years, and have not had a case of disease among them. Their long heavy fleece protects them from cold, and turns off the storms.

They come to early maturity. They may be fatted with profit when a year old. At two I have seen them fatted with very little grain, and sold to the butcher for eighteen dollars each.

They are disposed to become fat. It is well known that a given amount of food will produce a far greater amount of valuable fat and flesh on some animals than others. Grain fed to these sheep, produces more pounds of meat than when fed to swine, and the meat sells higher by the pound. The Genesee Farmer notices experiments in England on this very point. The food is carefully weighed and fed to the different kinds of sheep, and the result proves that a given amount of food produces more Cotswold mutton than any other kind.

These sheep attain a great size. A standing premium of one hundred dollars, for a sheep weighing two hundred pounds in the mutton, has been taken by this breed alone. The wool will pay the expense of keeping until three years of age. They have then been fatted to weigh three hundred pounds and sold for twenty-five dollars each. It has not been uncommon for this breed of sheep to furnish specimens approaching four hundred pounds, live weight. The two premium sheep of this kind in England, last year, reached the enormous weight of four hundred and twenty, and four hundred and ten pounds.

These sheep are well adapted to small farms, and thrive best in small flocks. The farmer of small means will find that with good care, fifteen of these sheep will produce as large an income as one hundred of the common kind, and much larger profit.

As ornaments to the grounds of gentlemen of wealth and taste, this variety of sheep is unrivaled. They have no taste for roving, never escape from their enclosure, are quiet and harmless among shrubbery and trees, gentle and even affectionate and grateful among children. Their great square forms and fleeces of snowy whiteness, are suggestive of comfort and good cheer, and their broad countenances beam with a quiet contentment and freedom from anxiety, which a wise man might well envy.

To many, the humble occupations and quiet pleasures of rural life, appear insipid, but for myself, I glory in the sentiment which the great bard of nature has placed in the mouth of his shepherd: "I am a true laborer; I earn that I eat, I get that I wear, I owe no man hate, envy no man's happiness, glad of other men's good, content with my farm, and the greatest of my pride is to see my ewes graze, and my lambs play."

Winter Food for Stock.

There is no doubt that many a farmer wishes he had sown a little Indian corn last season, for the purpose of eking out the fodder for his half-starving cattle during the past spring. Sowing Indian corn for fodder is one of those new practices which have come into vogue among enlightened farmers within the last ten years; and if it had been generally adopted the past dry season, would have been millions of dollars in the pockets of the husbandmen of this country, saved thousands of poor and almost worthless cattle from the butcher's shambles, and other thousands from what is akin to prolonged starvation.

Every farmer ought invariably to sow one acre of Indian corn for fodder for every ten head of animals which he keeps. In case of a drought, he will then obtain food enough from this source alone to one-third winter his stock, which would have the effect of lessening the price of hay, and enable him to retain or sell his surplus stock to greater advantage. American summers are often dry, very dry. Improvident indeed, then, is that man who depends entirely on grass for his stock; for a dry season cuts off from one-third to two-thirds of his crop. But with Indian corn it has not the same effect. Plough deep, manure well, and let the corn get one month's start, and it will take pretty good care of itself after that through the season, wet or dry. Sown in drills, one or two feet apart, the corn soon shades the ground, retains all the moisture of the soil, and nightly gathers in, by its long, broad leaves, nearly enough from the dews of heaven to keep it steadily along in its growth. By ploughing deep, it has the additional advantage of sending its roots so far below the surface of the soil as to be in moist ground, however dry it may be above.

Indian corn is the greatest boon that a beneficient Providence has yet sent to the American farmer. With plenty of the grain and stalks of this invaluable plant on hand, he is never absolutely in want; and can carry himself and stock through the severest winter, and come out in the spring in good condition. But its proper cultivation is not yet half, no, not even one-fourth attended to in the United States. The crops of the grain may be easily doubled, and the crop of stalks be quintupled and all this with little additional labor on the part of the farmer. With proper ploughs, planters, and cultivators, one man and a horse could easily cultivate as much corn on a free soil as five men and horses now do; and we are of the opinion that a reaper may be so constructed as to cut it when grown for fodder with nearly the same facility as rye or wheat is now cut, and that other machinery could be invented to facilitate drying and stacking when wanted for winter fodder. Then comes the straw-cutter, which, driven by a single horse power, will cut a ton of stalks easily in two hours, and a steam-vat will prepare it in two hours more in the very best manner for stock—and very fond indeed are they of it thus prepared; and one ton will do the grateful animals as much good as two, or perhaps three tons, thrown to them in the ordinary manner, in the open yard or field. [Agricultor.

The "Country Gentleman" has the following suggestions relative to the best mode of sowing corn for fodder:—

We have cultivated corn for fodder for many years, and find it, all things considered, the most profitable crop we can raise. It may be sown during the comparative season of leisure just after corn-planting, and secured at the next season of leisure just after haying and harvesting. After repeatedly cropping the same ground, we are satisfied that it rather enriches than impoverishes the land, no grain being formed, and a vast bed of roots remaining. Nothing is equal to it for reducing rough, turfy, weedy land, to a state of cleanliness and good tilth. We believe it the best fallow crop in the world, to precede wheat.

It should never be sown broadcast. The imperfections of this mode are the chief reasons that the crop has not become more generally introduced. It requires more seed, and leaves the ground in a fouler condition than when sown in plowed drills. We have tried both ways to our entire satisfaction, as to the comparative value of each. The following is the best mode for sowing, cultivating, and securing the crop:

Plow and harrow the ground as for any other crop; furrow it with a one-horse plow, three feet apart; let a man pass along one of these drills with a half-bushel basket on his left arm containing shelled corn, and strew the seed in the furrow at the rate of about 40 or 50 grains to a foot, which will be about 2½ or 3 bushels per acre. He will do this evenly, with a little práctice, as fast as he can walk. If sowed thinner, the crop will be smaller. We have found by accurately weighing and measuring, that 20 grains to the foot yielded only two-thirds the crop afforded by 40 grains to the foot. Immediately after the sower, follows a man with a one-horse harrow or cultivator, or with a two-horse harrow, lengthwise with the furrow, and covers the seed. Two men will thus plant six or seven acres in a day.

When the corn is six inches to a foot high, run a one-horse cultivator between the rows. This is all the dressing the crop needs. No hoeing is necessary, for the dense growth soon smothers down all else; and in the autumn, when the crop is cut off, the earth is left as clean as a newly plowed field.

It is to be harvested about the first of autumn. If the crop is very heavy or much "lodged," it is cut by reaping. If straight and even, a common sythe will answer the purpose, a little practice enabling the operator to throw it smoothly with the heads in one direction. After partly drying, for a day or two, the best way is to tie it in bundles and put it up in large shocks, although raking with a horse into winrows for cocks, might answer well for a large field. It must dry for some weeks. It can never be safely put into large stacks. The most perfect way would be to place it in small stacks or long, upright rows, under a large shed. Even if the stalks appear perfectly cured after several weeks exposure, they will certainly heat and spoil if stacked in the ordinary way. Hence the stacks must be quite small, freely salted, and well ventilated by means of three or four poles placed upright in the center. We have found the stalks to retain a good condition when left in large, well made shocks on the field, till wanted in winter. Curing is the only difficulty with this crop, and this ceases when understood.

Land that will yield thirty bushels of corn to the acre, will afford about five tons of dried fodder. Moist land is better than very dry, as it is more affected by drouth than ordinary corn crops. We have not found the cost, including interest on the land, to exceed $1 50 per ton for the dried fodder.

For soiling, or feeding green, corn fodder often proves of the highest value, when pastures are burnt by drouth. For this purpose, it may be sown at different periods till midsummer.

Sweet Potatoes.

I promised to say something relative to the culture of the sweet potato, and the best plan of keeping them for winter use. I now attempt to redeem my promise. Early in the spring, select a good piece of ground, rolling if possible, plow deep, and leave it uneven; the more uneven the better, for the more action the frost will have upon the ground the better will be the crop. Thus let it remain until you wish to set your plants, then plow again, and, with the harrow, make the ground level and very fine; lay it off three feet wide, and cross it, observing the same distance, and then the hills will be made with ease and dispatch. In each hill put two plants, six inches apart, use no water in setting the plants, unless the ground be very dry. The practice of freely watering plants is wrong.

So soon as the hills become weedy, hoe them downwards, with a sharp hoe; so soon as the tops have covered the top of the hill, then hoe them upwards, no more moving the drift after this.

In a short time, roots from the vine will strike into the ground; this must be prevented by lifting the vines carefully from the ground, which must be done when the sun shines warm; the heat will kill the sprouts and thus prevent their rooting again; this should be done once in two weeks.

It is a mistaken idea that the vines must be whipped, cut, tore up and thrown down to prevent their taking root.

One season, I put little bushes into the hills, and compelled the vines to mount the bushes; this does very well, but the plan described above is the better plan.

If you wish to have them very early at your table, or market, plant your hills two weeks sooner than you would for a general crop, regard not the frost; make for each hill a hand-light, thus:

Make a box with plank eight by ten inches, or any other size to suit your glass; let the back part of the box be six inches deep; and the front side four inches; have no bottom in it. On two sides of the box drive in nails, two on each side, and a fourth of an inch from the top. On these nails place the pane of glass, put the box on the hill, with the glass facing the sun. Should the days or nights be very cold, cover the hand-lights with anything that comes to hand. These hand-lights cost but little, are soon made, and the glass not injured, will do for any other purposes; they would not be nice enough for the flower-garden, but will answer every purpose for the kitchen-garden.

The potatoes should not be dug until there is a probability of the frost cutting the tops, which must not be suffered; and if, by chance, it should happen, dig them the same day, or, if that be not practicable, cut off the tops before sunrise. Should you fail to do this, you need not expect to keep them long. When you have cut off the tops as directed, you can bury the hill a foot deep with dirt lying by the side of the hill, and the potatoes will remain a few weeks in good eating order.

The methods of keeping potatoes through the winter, are almost without number, for every man has a way of his own. I have my way, and it is as follows:

Have a place prepared under the kitchen floor, and as near the fire as possible; in this put a box, as large as you please; now dig your potatoes, put them in a basket, handle them carefully, and do not bruise them; do not let the sun shine on them; take the dirt where they grew, (don't let it dry,) place this dirt in the bottom of the box, then a layer of potatoes, then one of dirt, and so on alternately until your box be full; do not let the potatoes touch each other. Some prefer sand; I have tried it, and they do well, but I prefer the dirt in which they grew. Manage seed potatoes in the same way, but in a separate box.

Selection of House Plants.

The catalogue of ornamental flowering plants has of late become so voluminous, that admirers of Flora must, for their own special benefit, resort to some well-conducted greenhouse, where they can feast their eyes on the beauties of nature, and make selections suitable to their own taste. There is just as much difference in regard to taste in the selection of plants, as there is in the choice of a wife or a husband.

I have ever been of the opinion, that a small collection of plants is preferable to a large one for room culture; say five or six varieties of the Camelia Japonica, and a similar number of choice and distinct varieties of the Chinese Azalea, six free-blooming roses, a few superb varieties of the Geranium, some four pots of the Hyacinth, of various colors, two pots of the Chinese Primula, one pink and the other white, two or three plants of the Linum Trygynum, a few plants of the Cactus family, say one plant of the night-blooming Cereus, one of the Truncatum, one of Mayfly, and one Speciosissimus, and others that the taste of the amateur may fancy. I will guarantee the above named varieties of the Cactus family to be such as will be highly appreciated by the amateur. Two plants of the Alonscas, one or two plants of Helitropium, a few varieties of the Verbena, one or two plants of the Memilus, one plant of each of the most superb varieties of the Chrysantheums, one plant of that magnificent and gaudy emblem of surpassing beauty, the Agapanthus, Umbalatus, a few sweet scented plants, as the Mignonette, and various kinds of Geranimums, with that favorite and highly odoriferous plant, the Aloys Citriodora, usually known by the name of the sweet-scented Verbena.

The above, intermixed with such others as fancy may dictate, will, in my opinion, make a very beautiful and desirable collection of plants, which will supply the amateur, with proper care, with a continued succession of flowers, even through the dreary months of winter. [Thomas Sheren.

Hints to Farmers.

Toads are the very best protection of cabbage against lice.

Plants, when drooping, are revived by a few grs. of camphor.

Pears are generally improved by grafting on the mountain ash.

Sulphur is valuable in preserving grapes, &c., from insects.

In feeding with corn, 60 lbs. ground goes as far as 100 lbs. in the kernel.

Turnips of small size have double the nutritious matter that large ones have.

Ruta Baga is the only root that increases in nutritious qualities as it increases in size.

Rats and other vermin are kept away from grain by sprinkling garlic when packing the sheaves.

Money skillfully expended in drying land by draining or otherwise, will be returned with ample interest.

QUEEN VICTORIA.—A lady correspondent of the National Intelligencer, who has a talent for attractive gossip, having been present at a Court ball in London, gives this little sketch of Queen Victoria:—

"All this time the ball was going on with animation in two other large rooms, with three orchestras in full tide at once; but there was no dancing, except by the Court, in the presence of the Queen. She chatted with her mother, and the Prince, seeming to be amused at the scene. She certainly knows how to behave, and does one thing exceedingly well, which is to bow with grace and dignity; but she is too short and dumpy to be very regal in bearing, and did not strike me as an elegant woman by any means, indulging in several little ways which were not becoming; but her manner is perfectly natural, and she appears to be very kind. Her Majesty began to look sleepy, but brightened up when the Lord Mayor, on his knee, announced that supper awaited her pleasure."

OLE BULL'S COLONY.—The Norwegian Colony founded by Ole Bull, about ten miles from Coudersport, Pa., appears from the latest accounts to be in a most flourishing state. The settlers are very much pleased with their location, are industrious, and have already made great improvements. Since the winter set in they have been very active, and they are now busily engaged in making roads, building houses, mills, and other works. Several new houses have been entirely completed, and the prospect now is, that preparations will be made, by spring, for receiving a large addition to their settlement. At Cartee Camp, a new school house has been erected, and a school is to be opened in it in a short time. A steam saw-mill, and two water-mills, are already under way, and everything about the settlement indicates energy and prosperity.

If all of the labor of the British empire were performed by hand, it would require the active exertion of every full-grown man in the world.

VARIETY.

An account is given in a Java newspaper called the "Bode" of a public auction of three families of slaves belonging to the estate of a deceased Chinese lady. A large number of persons were in attendance, and when the sale was about to commence, the twelve slaves stood up, and begging pardon for the liberty, displayed a few rupees which they had scraped together, and besought the favor to be permitted to bid with the rest for the purchase of their liberty. The Government broker seconded the request and commenced a bid on their behalf. Although nearly the whole Chinese population was present, not a bid was made against them, and they all obtained their liberty for thirty-seven francs.

It wasn't a bad trick that was put upon a law student by his fellows, when, having observed that he read always by quantity, and, of course, very superficially, they used every night to put back the mark, which he left in his Blackstone, about three-fourths the distance of that day's reading. The consequence was that, without knowing it, he read the work through several times, and, on being questioned at last on how he liked its author, replied, that "Blackstone seemed to him rather a pleasant writer, but he must say there was rather too much repetition for a good style."

It is observed by an ingenious writer, that "they who least consult their appetite, who least give way to its wantonness or voraciousness, attain, generally, to years far exceeding those who deny themselves nothing they can relish and conveniently procure." And it has been remarked, in favor of temperance, that the "miserly, who eat but sparingly of plain food, and drink nothing but water, in general live long."

Bradford, in his History of Massachusetts, states that on the Anniversary of the Society for promoting Industry, three hundred females of Boston assembled on the Common with their spinning wheels. They were neatly attired in cloth of their own manufacture, and a great crowd of spectators collected to witness the scene. This was in 1753, just one hundred years ago.

Friendship is a vase which, when it is flawed by heat, or violence, or accident, may as well be broken at once; it can never be trusted after. The more graceful and ornamental it was, the more clearly do we discern the hopelessness of restoring it to its former state. Coarse stones, if they are fractured, may be cemented again; precious ones, never.

There is one manufactory of playing cards in the city of New York, which turns out about 21,600 packs of playing cards a day, or 150 gross. The single item of paste used requires four hundred barrels of flour a year. The building is a five story one, and a forty horse steam engine is used, with twenty or thirty workmen constantly employed.

It is said that China expends more than $40,000,000 for the single article of opium, annually; nearly as much as the whole amount of the revenue of the United States, from all sources whatever; and a larger sum than any nation on the globe pays to another for a single raw material, with the exception of what Great Britain pays to this country for cotton.

The Providence Post says there is now on exhibition in that city a California sheep, which has the largest growth of wool upon its back we ever saw. The animal is not above the ordinary size, but weighs, with its fleece, 125 lbs. The wool is of a fine texture, and measures some 22 inches in length.

In Mr. Dix's new work, "A winter in Madeira and a summer in Spain," in a chapter on Gibraltar, it is stated that the expense of maintaining that important fortress is $850,000 per annum, and the revenue derived from it is but $150,000—leaving a balance of $700,000 to be made up by Great Britain.

At the annual examination of the Normal School at West Newton, it was stated by the Principal, Mr. Allen, that one of his pupils had been connected with the school five years, during which time he had not once been absent or tardy. Such an example is worthy of imitation.

An old toper who lately attended an exhibition where a learned professor caused several explosions to take place among gases produced from water, said—"You don't catch me putting much water in my liquor after this; I had no idea that water was so dangerous, though I never take much of it."

The epochs of our life are not in the visible facts of our choice of calling, our marriage, our acquisition of an office, or the like, but a silent thought by the wayside as we walk; in a thought which revises our entire manner of life, and says—"Thus hast thou done, but it were better thus."

The People of Rhode Island have by nearly a thousand majority voted to sustain their Liquor Law. Politically, the Democrats have swept the State, and, it is affirmed, have elected a majority of Anti-Liquor Law members to the Legislature.

Recently a car ran off the track on the Richmond and Petersburg Railroad. The bottom of the car was ripped out, and the passengers thrown to the ground. Six persons were badly injured, but no lives were lost.

Rising and setting suns are commonplace exhibitions, when, were there only one such exhibition to be witnessed in a century, multiplied millions, nay, almost half the population of the globe, would behold it with rapture.

An English paper, noticing the fact that a young man had broken both legs, concludes the paragraph by saying that "we are happy to hear that he is going on as well as could be expected."

A critic, speaking of Mr. Haydon's wonderful picture, The Burning of Rome, says:—"If Rome was anything like what Mr. Haydon has painted it, Nero has been shamefully abused for burning it."

Some shrewd statistician informs us that the population of Lexington, Ky., is thus singularly divided with respect to the sexes:—Males, 2764; Females, 2765—leaving a single woman unprovided for.

POLITICAL CHRISTIANITY.

BY S. S. GRISWOLD.

'Politics is the science of government; and science is a collection of general principles on a subject.' (Webster's Dictionary.) The true science of politics is a collection of the true principles of government. He then is the best and wisest politician, who collects and efficiently applies the best principles of human government. That human governments have a divine sanction, will be questioned by only a few; but that all kinds of human governments have received the divine approbation, will be believed by still fewer. The Supreme Ruler has not hesitated often to manifest his disapprobation of human governments, and has razed many such to the ground, because they refused to recognize the true principles of human government.

It appears, that the Creator has made to inhere in all human governments a law by which one set of principles will preserve them, and another set of principles will destroy them; and so fixed and certain are these principles, that no wisdom or power of man can prevent the legitimate results. And did we but read the decline and fall of past governments aright, we should see that each and all of them owed their ruin to a violation of the fundamental principles of political economy. The Assyrian, the Persian, the Grecian, the Roman empires, all have fallen, in consequence of their infraction of the laws of their existence. The same may be said of the kingdom of Judea. And were the pen of prophecy to write to-day the future history of the various nations now in existence, the same would be written of them, unless they conform to those true principles of political economy which only can save any people.

The question, then, is an important one, Where can those principles be found which will secure a nation's prosperity, a nation's greatness, and a nation's duration? That such principles will not be found among the archives of past nations, is more than probable, from the fact that those nations probably demonstrated in their history the laws and principles of government on their own statute books, and as by such demonstrations of their own laws they proved their destruction, we may reasonably conclude that the principles of a nation's existence were not in their possession. The Apostle tells us, that the world by wisdom knew not God, and that it hath pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save men. That this salvation includes national salvation, must be conceded, when we take in the whole of salvation. We are also told that Christ came to destroy the works of the devil. If so, then as a nation's wickedness is the work of the devil, its destruction is doomed. Are we not, then, to look for the only true principles of human government in that system of political economy taught by Jesus Christ? In other words, must not the principles of Christianity be applied to human governments, in order to ensure their duration?

That such was one of the objects of Christianity, appears evident from the fact that Jesus laid the foundation of a kingdom, which was to have a visibility in this world—a kingdom which was to take such a prominence among other kingdoms of the earth, that it was to supersede, outlive, and subdue them all to itself. Of such importance was his kingdom, that Jesus embodied a petition for it specially, in that form of prayer he gave his disciples. Daniel had reference to this kingdom, when he said, that in the days of those kings shall the God of Heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever. John the Baptist referred to this kingdom, when he said, The kingdom of heaven is at hand; and Jesus spoke of the same kingdom in the parables of the mustard seed and leaven, as well as in some others. The final triumph of this kingdom is symbolized in the vision of John while on the Isle of Patmos, wherein also we are informed that the tabernacle of God is to be with men, and He is to dwell with them, and be their God. It is also foretold, that the whole earth is yet to be full of the knowledge and the glory of God—that Jesus is yet to reign from the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same—that the kingdoms of this world are yet to become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ. Time would fail me to recapitulate the many references to this kingdom in the Bible. It forms one of the great themes therein contained. It was the burden of prophetic song—the great subject of prophetic contemplation. To accomplish this, Jesus commissioned men to go into all the world, and to preach his gospel to every creature. For this, the kingdoms of this world are to be turned and overturned, until he shall come whose right it is to reign, and whose is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, forever.

Having shown that there has been laid the foundation of a kingdom, which has been going on, and is continuing its increase, and which will yet fill the whole earth, (for of its increase there is to be no end, so long as the sun and the moon shall endure,) I now proceed to show the political character of this kingdom.

Politics is the science of government; therefore political Christianity is the science of Christian government. That a Christian government was designed to exist in this world, is evident from what has been said respecting the kingdom of heaven, which is but the name used by the sacred writers to designate that Christian form of human government which is yet to obtain. For if by the kingdom of heaven is intended the establishment of Christianity in the world, and if the establishment of Christianity necessarily embraces the ordering of human government, it follows of course that Christianity must have to do with politics. I make this remark, because there seems to be an opinion quite prevalent, that religion, or Christianity, ought to be divorced from politics. That untiring efforts have been made thus to separate all subjects relating to politics from Christianity, will not be denied; for who does not know, that decided opposition is continually being made to the connecting of any of the great reformatory measures of the day with politics? And to such an extent have political demagogues "wooled" many otherwise good Christians, that even such have been led astray upon the subject. The consequences have been most deleterious to the interests of Christ's kingdom. Christianity, which was designed to be the salt of the earth, and the light of the world, has lost much of its power to reform, and indeed itself needs a most thorough reformation. All this because Christians have permitted themselves to be hood-winked by designing, worldly politicians. The cry of union of church and state has been the mad-dog cry, by which satan has artfully carried on his plans, and still aims at the complete usurpation of the kingdom of earth. It is time, then, that Christians arise and assert their claims to influence human governments. It is time that the sacramental hosts of God's elect should lead the vanguard in the political world, and, marshaled under their own proper leader, Jesus Christ, deposit their suffrages for Him who is King of kings, and Lord of lords.

Let us, then, inquire how such a state of things was to be brought about. It was not to be accomplished by any departure from the principles of Christianity, as taught by its Author. That system of moral ethics, of all others, was never designed to gain strength in the world by any departure from its principles. Its Author was the most uncompromising of all ethical teachers; and he took special pains to inculcate this feature of his kingdom on all who should become his disciples. To do evil that good might come, he reprobated. He spurned the proposal of satan, the prince of darkness, to dispose of all his right and title in the kingdoms of earth, by an unholy compromise. In fact, such is the nature of this kingdom, that it can be advanced only by a strict adherence to its own legitimate principles.

Now, as the principles of Christ's kingdom stand as the very antipodes, the very antagonisms, of the kingdoms of this world, then in existence, it is evident that its subjects, at first, could have but little connection with or participation in the then existing politics, or human governments as they were then managed. And it was not until Christianity had so far modified human governments as to permit the Christian citizen to carry his Christian principles with him into those governments, that Christians participated in the affairs of politics. When this was effected, then appeared the Christian politician. And had not the Christian politician begun to compromise his principles—had he but stood, like his leader, to his party—political Christianity would ere this have been the dominant party. The fatal rock on which the ship of political Christianity has foundered—the maelstrom into which she has been drawn—was and is still compromise. With perhaps the best intention of doing God a service, Christianity sold her birthright for a mess of political pottage, and ever since, Ichabod has been written on her brow.

As the kingdom of Christ was to become a universal kingdom, such must be its general principles, that it can exist under any form of government, until it can so modify other governments that it more or less controls or supersedes them. At the introduction of Christianity, or the commencement of this Christian empire, but few of the ruling powers were elective; or, if elective, such was the manner of election, that Christians could not participate in it. Christians were therefore deprived of the right to administer in human governments. But such was the inherent power of Christianity—such the nature of Christ's kingdom—that within a short time even the government of the Roman empire was so modified that Christians thought it not violative of their principles to participate in the affairs of state, although such participation was probably premature, and required a partial abandonment of their high moral rectitude, and laid the foundation of those future compromises by which Christianity has fallen so low that many refuse to do her reverence.

I repeat, then, before Christians could aid in administering human government, such government must have become so far permeated with Christian principle, that for a Christian to participate therein would require no dereliction of Christian principle. When such a modification of the laws and practices of human government was effected, it became not only the privilege but the duty of the Christian citizen to participate in the business of the political world. For government is but impressing the concentrated voice of a people upon their own collective activities in this form. It therefore becomes one of the imperative duties of Christianity, to aid its own advancement in this way. Until human governments are thus semi-christianized, one great field of Christian labor is to bring about such a change in them as has been referred to. It equally becomes the duty of the Christian citizen to aid human government in carrying forward its ultimate design, securing the happiness and improvement of its subjects, and affording protection to all. Just so far, then, as the Christian can act in human government and not infract or derelict Christian principle, it is his privilege and duty, but no farther. Never, under any pretense of securing any good whatever, may the Christian citizen add to or subtract from the words of the book. It is therefore to be supposed, that for a long time such would be the state of human governments that the Christian could only partially participate in them, but must patiently wait until such time as Christianity shall have removed the obstacles to his farther progress. Standing shoulder to shoulder, the Christian politicians are to aim at the complete renovation of all governments from every wrong, or their total subversion. Yet all this is to be accomplished, not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord. No din of arms, no clanking of chains, no groans of the wounded, or shrieks of the dying, are to be heard on the plains of victory. Political Christianity forbids all resort to arms, or appeals to the sword, to effect her conquests. The sword of the Christian citizen, politician, and soldier, was sheathed in Gethsemane, never to be redrawn.

Am I told that no human government can be sustained without falling back on brute force?—that no government can be sustained without a war police? Admitting such to be the fact, in all cases of human government where the leaven of Christianity had not so far operated as to preclude a resort to arms or war police; admitting the war principle to be necessary to the maintenance, continuance, or even safety of all human governments, based upon a mere worldly, selfish, sinful principle; it does not necessarily follow, that a human government based upon Christian principle cannot be sustained without it. It has been shown, that no Christian could participate in human government, unless he could there carry his Christianity with him—that he had no right to enter any farther into their arrangements than Christian principle would let him—and that he must depend alone upon the inherent power of his principles so to modify such governments as that he could participate in them, without becoming recreant to his trust. Therefore, as Christianity forbids war, or a resort to arms, the Christian is not bound, nay, not permitted, to aid or abet any human government in this particular. It may not be necessary for the Christian citizen entirely to withhold himself from the political world in order not to be a participant in the war department. But as almost all governmental constitutions embody a provision for their own amendment, the Christian citizen is to labor so to amend them as that they will conform to Christian principle wholly. But if, while in the service of the government, he is called to act in any capacity where Christian principle would be violated, or even compromised, he must resign, and leave that feature of the government to some one who fears not God nor regards man.

But to return to the consideration of government being sustained without a war police. It is to be premised, that the Christian citizen is a man of peace—that he will give no just occasion for wrangling, contention, fighting, war—that should he infringe on the rights, privileges, or feelings of any, he will make all due reparation and satisfaction. Further, he will suffer wrong rather than do wrong; and, further still, he will even suffer death, rather than deny Christ, or prove false to his teachings; he will endure hardness as a good soldier, and live and die true to his principles, as did Jesus, the Apostles, and early Christians.

This being admitted, it is not difficult to see how a Christian human government can be sustained without a war police. Christian citizens are to advance step by step in taking part in human government, just so far and fast, and only just so far and fast, as they can, and take Christianity along with them, until they become the majority—have the ascendancy, and take to themselves the power of controlling all such human governments as they have in this way subdued. Then right and justice being administered to all, none having just cause of complaint, all will be peace and quiet. Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, being guarantied to all, all would dwell under their own vines and fig-trees, with none to molest or make them afraid. Universal peace will then prevail, as all cause of war has been removed. He that administers the government will feel bound to subserve the interests of the people, and vice versa.

I have said, that the kingdom of heaven, or the government of Christ, can be advanced only in accordance with its own principles, and any departure from a strict adherence to these principles, under any pretext, serves but to embarrass and hinder. The saying, "Save me from my friends," has been fearfully illustrated in the Christian world. Under the hope of securing to a greater extent the influence or patronage of the world, Christianity has come near compromising its very existence. Let us see.

All human governments have been, more or less, and still are, affected by relics from heathenism. To be sure, Christianity has very much modified and improved upon pagan governments. It has abolished many cruel and unjust laws, cruel and sanguinary penalties, and heathenish customs; yet there are enough left to call loudly for still farther improvement. I will refer to one, which stands at the very threshhold of every political kingdom on earth, but which political Christianity does not admit; and yet Christians have been so forgetful of their birthright, in that point, as not even to demand its removal. I refer to oath-taking. It is universal, that before any one can legally act in our government, he must submit to an oath. The same is true, I believe, of every other government in existence. Now, political Christianity forbids all oath-taking, and limits the Christian politician to yea and nay. This anti-Christian requirement of human governments, as a prerequisite to acting in them, has and now does preclude many worthy men from exerting their influence in the political world. It therefore seems to me to be one of the imperative duties resting upon the Christian world, to demand the immediate removal of this anti-Christian prefix to human governments. This peculiar feature of anti-Christian powers has tended much to destroy reverence for God, and to clothe our nation with oath-swearing or cursing, as with a garment. For not a solitary disciple of Christ, however upright and truthful he may be, no, not even he who officiates at the sacred altar of religion, can give testimony in a court, although the case should involve but the value of a farthing, until he is required to violate a plain prohibition of Jesus Christ. And should he refuse thus to submit himself to the powers that be, he will be confined like a common felon in a jail. I admit that Christianity has, by compromise, made a slight improvement upon paganism, but instead of improvement, it ought to have abrogated it entirely.

There is yet another feature of human government which much impedes the progress of political Christianity, viz., the embodiment in national and state constitutions of principles violative of Christianity. Now, could the Christian politician be permitted to act politically, without swearing to support such constitutions, it would be all that could be expected. Although some do so understand such constitutional obligations as not to require them to carry out any of their provisions which are anti-Christian, yet there are not wanting many others, who find it difficult to swallow the dose, even with the apparent salvable clause which provides for their alteration or amendment. It therefore becomes a question of serious inquiry, in Christian politics, what is the exact nature and extent of those obligations which one assumes in pledging to support any of these political constitutions.

THE OPIUM TRADE.

A late number of the New York Medical Gazette contains the following interesting information relative to opium and the trade connected with it. The article is from the pen of Nathan Allen, M. D., of Lowell, Mass.

Opium, as is well known, is the production of the plant paperer somniferum, called in English the poppy. This plant was originally a native of Persia, but is now found growing as an ornamental plant in gardens throughout the world. It is most extensively cultivated in India, where it is estimated that more than 100,000 acres of the rich plains of that country are occupied for this purpose, giving employment to many thousands of men, women and children. Its cultivation throughout is very simple. The seed is sown in November, and the juice is collected during a period of about six weeks in February and March. The falling of the flowers from the plant is the signal for incisions, which is done in the cool of the evening, with hooked knives, in a circular manner around the capsules. From these incisions a white milky juice exudes, which is concreted into a dark brown mass by the heat of the next day's sun; and this being scraped off every evening, as the plant continues to exude, it constitutes opium in its crude state. India, it is said, produces 60,000 chests of opium annually, each chest varying in weight from one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and forty pounds.

Two of the principal localities for the cultivation of this drug in Bengal are subject to the East India Company, and the manufacture and traffic is a strict monopoly of the government. In the others, there is a most oppressive system of espionage established over the natives, to an extent which throws the control of the traffic into the hands of the same company. On that which was raised in Malwa, a province lying in the western part of India, beyond the East India Company's control, and which, in order to reach Bombay, the principal market, has to pass through certain territories of the Company, a transit duty of 400 rupees is levied. The income from this tax in 1848 was £1,000,000, which, with the revenue received the same year, at Calcutta, from the article, makes the sum total of income to the Company from it, £3,000,000.

The idea of sending opium from Bengal to China originated in 1767. From this time to 1794 the trade in it met with poor success. In the latter year the English succeeded in stationing one of their ships laden with opium at Whampoa, where for more than a year she lay unmolested, selling out her cargo. In 1821, owing to the difficulties attending the sale at these places, the opium merchants withdrew all their vessels from Whampoa and Macao, and stationed them under shelter of Lintin Island, in the bay, at the entrance of Canton river, which henceforth became the seat of extensive trade. From these vessels it was taken in Chinese junks and smugglers' boats, and retailed at various ports along the shore. In 1847, it is said, about fifty vessels were engaged exclusively in this trade, besides a greater or less number which were only partially freighted with the drug.

It is stated that two and a half million dollars' worth of opium is annually imported into Foo-Chow, from whence it finds its way into the interior. In that city alone there were, in 1848, one hundred houses devoted to the smoking of the drug, while as many retailed the poison in small quantities.

As respects the progress and present extent of the trade, it is said that from 1794 to 1820, the amount exported to China varied from 3,000 to 7,000 chests per year. In 1837 it amounted to between 39,000 and 40,000 chests, valued at $25,000,000. From 1738 to 1842 the trade was almost entirely interrupted by the war which grew out of attempts on the part of the Chinese government to suppress it. At the conclusion of the war, the trade was resumed with renewed vigor. For the year 1848, the amount imported into China from Bombay was 19,111 chests, and from Calcutta 36,000 chests, which, at an average of $560 per chest, would amount to $32,000,000 expended for this single article of trade. Then the Chinese pay an advance on this sum of several millions more, which goes into the hands of the merchants as the fruit of their investment and labors in the trade.

The principal use made of opium by the Chinese, is in the form of smoking, a practice to which they have become most passionately addicted. The wealthier orders do their smoking in their own dwellings, but for the poorer classes there are thousands of shops fitted, in many of the Chinese cities, with accommodations expressly for smoking. Many of these shops are represented to be the most miserable and wretched places imaginable. Rev. Mr. Squire, of the Church Missionary Society, says of them: "Never, perhaps, was there a nearer approach to hell upon earth, than in the precincts of these vile hovels, where gambling is likewise carried to a great extent." It is stated that there are one thousand of these opium shops in the city of Amoy. All classes in the community are addicted to the practice.

The effects of this drug upon the consumer are thus described by a distinguished Chinese scholar: "It exhausts the animal spirits, impedes the regular performance of business, wastes the flesh and blood, dissipates every kind of property, renders the person ill-favored, promotes obscenity, discloses secrets, violates the laws, attacks the vitals, and destroys life." This statement is confirmed by other natives, and also by foreign residents; and it is asserted that, as a general rule, a person does not live more than ten years after becoming addicted to the use of this drug.

The Chinese government has made strong efforts to cut off or restrict the traffic in this drug. Public attention was directed to its injurious effects in 1799, and in 1809 an edict was issued requiring all ships discharging their cargoes at Whampoa, to give bonds that they had no opium on board. Still more stringent laws were adopted in 1820. In 1834 an edict was issued, declaring that the injury done by the influx of opium, and by the increase of those who inhaled it, was nearly equal to a general conflagration, and denouncing upon the seller and smoker of the poison the bastinado, the wooden-collar, imprisonment, banishment, confiscation of property, and even death by public decapitation or strangulation. But notwithstanding all this, the trade kept increasing, until at length the imperial commissioner was appointed, clothed with the highest authority, to proceed to Canton, and endeavor to effect an utter annihilation of the trade. In carrying out this determination, he seized and destroyed some 20,280 chests of opium, and compelled the merchants to sign a bond that they would forever cease trading in the article. This bold and decided measure on the part of the commissioner led to the war with England, which is commonly known as the opium war, the result of which is well known to our readers. The Chinese were defeated, and subjected to terms which reflected any thing but honor upon the conquerors; one of which was the forcing of this traffic upon the Chinese—a traffic which they had always contrabanded as illegal, and had striven by every means in their power to annihilate and protect their people from. When urged to legalize the trade, the emperor replied in these memorable words—"It is true," said he, "I cannot prevent the introduction of the flowing poison; gain-seeking and corrupt men will, for profit and sensuality, defeat my wishes; but nothing will induce me to derive a revenue from the vice and misery of my people."

One result of the war was the ceding of the island of Hong Kong to the English. In this island, after passing into the hands of the victors, the trade in opium was legalized, and twenty shops for its sale immediately licensed, within gun-shot of the Chinese empire, where such an offense is punishable with death. Thus the war, instead of putting an end or check to the system, through the cupidity of the English, resulted in affording greater facilities than ever for its prosecution. The Chinese dare not impose the penalties affixed to a violation of their laws restricting the trade, which have never been abrogated or repealed, for fear that if they should do so it might be made the ground-work for another war, which would result in their being despoiled of still larger portions of their territory and possessions.

It is stated, upon the highest authority, that the British government in India could not be sustained without the immense revenues derived from this trade. This revenue, for the last six years, it is said, has amounted to nearly $80,000,000. It is also estimated, that the immense sum of $400,000,000 of specie has been drained from China, to pay for this single article alone, within the last half century. That this pernicious contraband traffic is upheld mainly by the British government, through its agent, the East India Company, all are aware; and the stain of its conduct towards the Chinese, in forcing this "flowing poison upon" them, is held up to the detestation of the civilized world. Money, not morality, had been its governing principle, and to increase its own resources and power, it has legalized and upheld this traffic, which is destroying, morally, socially and politically, the whole Chinese nation; and which threatens to blot it out from among the nations of the earth. Well might we inquire, what must be the verdict of future generations, as they peruse the history of these wrongs and outrages? Will not the page of history, which now records £20,000,000 as consecrated on the altar of humanity to emancipate 800,000 slaves, lose all its splendor, and become positively odious, when it shall be known that this very money was obtained from the proceeds of a contraband traffic on the shores of a weak and defenseless heathen empire, at the sacrifice, too, of millions upon millions of lives.

STEWARDSHIP.

"I cannot afford to increase my subscriptions, Mr. H.," said a wealthy merchant to a gentleman who was conversing with him upon the claims of the Foreign and Home Mission Societies. "My business requires a large capital, and my family expenses are by no means small."

"But your property, my dear sir, has much increased during the last seven years."

"It has, I admit, but my expenses have increased with it."

"That is, you have surrounded yourself and family with more of the luxuries and elegancies of life." Mr. H. was one of those rare individuals, who always speak with perfect frankness, but whose motives are so single, so benevolent, and so easily discerned, that they seldom or never give offence."

"You do not mean to say that it is wrong to vary my expenses with my income."

"No, Mr. B., I do not. But if you can afford to surround yourself with increasing comforts and luxuries, why cannot you afford to increase your subscriptions to those benevolent societies which need your aid? If I understood you rightly, you said your subscriptions had not varied in amount for the last seven years."

"Why, my present personal and family expenses consume all the money I can spare from my business."

"But who has so blessed your exertions, as that you have been able to extend your business operations, and improve your style of living? Had the Divine favor been withholden, all your efforts would have been in vain. And you will pardon me, if I say that it seems alike ungenerous and ungrateful, when God has so abundantly blessed you with temporal gifts, to bring no more into his treasury, than when your property was much less. It seems to be practically saying, that you have no disposition to act as his steward, or to deny yourself a few of the luxuries of life, for One who gave his own Son to die for you."

"But I give as much as Mr. C. and Mr. M., and their means are, to say the least, as large as mine."

"What others give is not your standard, and if it were, you could find many, whose means are much less, who give twice, or even three times the amount which you contribute. There is Mr. A.; he gives double your amount."

"Mr. A.! you surprise me; he is doing a small business, and lives in a very ordinary way."

"He is living as a steward of his Divine Master—dispensing liberally to all who need his aid, and laying up his treasures where neither moth nor rust can corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal. But even Christians of his stamp should not be your standard. The Lord Jesus Christ is our great exemplar. Though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich. No one can be a true disciple of His, unless they deny themselves, in imitation of his illustrious example."

Mr. B. sat silent for a moment, after these words were spoken, but evidently thoughtful. Then the entrance of a clerk prevented continuance of the conversation. But we will hope that riches had not so hardened his heart, as that in the great day of account the words of his friend and neighbor shall be cited in condemnation against him.

JOHN FAWCETT, D. D.

Reader, you have often united with the vast multitude of Christians in singing,

"Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in Christian love."

But perhaps you know little or nothing of its author, about whom much that is pleasing might be told. He flourished during the latter part of the last century, and the early portion of this, and was one of the most commanding and dignified persons on whom you ever looked. His place of labor was near Halifax, in Yorkshire, in the father-land; which should you ever visit, you will yet find many to whom his memory is dear; nor will you hear any thing but what is gratifying of sons, and sons' sons, who, like their venerated ancestor, have been engaged in preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Perhaps you might find in the neighborhood, one or two persons, who would point out to you the cottage which gave birth to John Foster, the Essayist, and who would tell you some of the eccentricities of his youth, his conversion to God, his baptism by Dr. Fawcett, his entrance on studies for the ministry, and the ardent attachment between his pastor and his friend till death. It is probable that all are now dead who remember Ward, the missionary, and his studies under the doctor at "the Hall;" but there are not a few whom he prepared for the pulpit, and for commercial pursuits, who yet revere his memory as a sacred treasure.

For more than fifty years he was pastor of the church he served. Tradition, indeed, tells a tale that he once resigned the pastorate. While he was yet a young man, "he had a call to London," which he accepted, and took his "farewell" of his people. Never till he had done that, had he been aware how strong was the tie that bound them together. The act was completed, the wagons were loaded with his furniture, ready for a fortnight or three weeks' journey; but the people, old and young, down to the very children, hung around him and his family, as though they could not let him go. Sitting down on one of the packages to rest for a moment or two, his wife looked tearfully in his face, and said, "John, I don't like this going, after all." "Nor I either," said the weeping husband and pastor, "and I won't go." The furniture was unpacked, and replaced in the house, a letter dispatched to London, withdrawing his acceptance of the call, and forty years longer were given to his former charge, till death removed him to another sphere of service in heaven.

King George the Third numbered among his personal friends three Baptist ministers—Dr. Samuel Stennett, Dr. Fawcett, and John Martin. The Sovereign's attention was first attracted to Dr. Fawcett, by a quotation made from his "Essay on Anger," in a sermon of one of the royal chaplains. The king borrowed the book, read it, and wrote to thank its author, offering him any favor in his power to bestow. Fawcett thanked his Sovereign, but needed no favors. Afterward, however, he implored the Sovereign for the pardon of a son of a worthy Baptist deacon, who had committed forgery, and had been sentenced to die. The pardon was given, and the young man afterwards became a Christian, and served Christ for many years, as an active member of a Baptist church in the north of England.

WHAT COULD BE DONE WITH GROG-MONEY.—In a recent temperance speech in New York, P. T. Barnum is represented as having stated that there were 7,000 grog shops in this city, with an average custom in each of probably $10 a day. He made the following offer to the city, viz: If the city would shut up all the groggeries, and give him the amount spent in all of them, he would pay all the city taxes, amounting to $4,000,000; send every child to a good school; present every family with a library of 100 good books, 3 barrels of flour, and a silk dress to every female, old or young, and give every body a free ticket to his Museum.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, April 28, 1853.

☞ Persons indebted to the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society, for the Sabbath Recorder, the Sabbath-School Visitor, or the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial, are earnestly requested to make immediate payment. The current financial year of the Society closes six weeks from to-day. Those who neglect paying until the year closes, are liable to an additional charge of fifty cents per volume of the Sabbath Recorder. Persons living near our local agents, should pay to them. Others should remit by mail, which may be done at our risk, provided a description of the bills is left with the postmaster. Postage stamps may be sent for fractional parts of a dollar.

CONVICTION OF SIN.

As it was declared that the Holy Spirit should convince the world of sin, (John 16: 8,) it is supposed by some that, wherever the gospel is preached, men are all the subjects of this conviction, and that hence there is no obstacle in the way of their becoming new creatures in Christ Jesus. But facts show that, whatever ideas men generally entertain about sin, they do not experience that kind of conviction which was spoken of by the Saviour as being the office of the Holy Spirit to bring about. For, however ready they may be to condemn themselves for swearing, lying, murder, stealing, and such gross practices; and however ready they may even be, in some instances, to condemn themselves for wicked thoughts; they never make any great account of the sin of unbelief. They neither regard their habitual neglect of the gospel as any great crime in itself, nor do they feel any conviction of that deep, desperate, total depravity of their hearts, which places them in need of a Saviour. If they inquire after a Saviour at all, it is simply as a remedy for their deficiencies, but not as the sole and only source of life.

The nature of the conviction which Christ declared the Holy Spirit should produce, is explained in the words, "Of sin, because they believe not on me." That is, he shall show men that, unless they believe on Christ, they are so thoroughly and totally sinful—so completely destitute of all holiness—so completely bereft of all power to help themselves, that they must perish forever. Such conviction is not felt by every body. Those who do experience it never stop short of that faith which is to the salvation of their souls. They cannot rest till they have found Christ, and seen in him their complete justification.

Here, then, lies the great difference between that common kind of conviction, which is experienced by the great mass of the community, and that true shining of God into the heart, which always gives the "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." It is a great error in theology, to assume that sinners generally see sin in its true light. So far as its real nature is concerned, they are as much in darkness as the heathen themselves. Its exceeding sinfulness is not apprehended by them.

It is not doubted that, under nothing more than common or ordinary convictions, sinners may become greatly alarmed, and be filled with the most awful terrors, when they reflect that, because of such sins as they are in the habit of committing, the wrath of God is revealed against them. But this is no proof that they are prepared for the comforting promises of the gospel. And it ought to be seriously looked into by ministers, and all who have a care for their souls, whether there is really that spiritual conviction, without which they are still "in the gall of bitterness." We fear that this is a point where the requisite discrimination is not always used. It is too much taken for granted, that because sinners are trembling in view of divine wrath, they are therefore prepared for Christ. It is not necessarily so. True, it is a ground of encouragement even to see them tremble, considering the general indifference, and even stupidity, manifested in regard to eternal things; but unless they are brought to cry out, "O, wretched men that we are!" there is no warrant for speaking comfortably to them.

It is fair to presume that Paul, in his natural state, had as clear views of the nature of sin, as men generally have. He had the Law of God before him; its requisitions were plain before his eyes. Yet his own testimony is, that he never knew himself to be a dead sinner, till the commandment was applied to his heart in that new and powerful way which the Holy Spirit employs; he thought himself alive. He was, therefore, not yet convinced of the true nature of sin; he had not yet found it to be "exceeding sinful."

The faith of multitudes, we fear, is founded upon nothing more than the common conviction to which we have referred. They have never seen themselves utterly "lost." They were sensible of defects, it is true, and, in some instances perhaps, very keenly sensible of them; they knew that their obedience was not perfect, and that all their actions were tainted with sin. But they were never made sensible that all their life had been one unmixed course of evil.

PERSECUTION IN PRUSSIA.

There is a law on the statute-books of Prussia, that "whoever blasphemes God, either in word, writing, or in any other way, or derides one of the Christian churches, or a religious party possessing corporate rights, or the subjects of their veneration, doctrines, organization, or customs, or refers to them in a way which exposes them to hatred or contempt, shall be punished with imprisonment not to exceed three years." Forgetful or indifferent to this law, Pastor Heinrich, on occasion of the anniversary of the Réformation, preached a sermon from the text, "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path," in which he examined in the light of Scripture the characteristic differences of the Protestant and Roman Churches—a sermon which he afterward printed, in order to obtain something from its sale to assist in purchasing a new organ for the church of which he is pastor. Immediately the law was down upon him for deriding "one of the Christian churches," namely, the Roman Catholic Church. The case was tried before the criminal court of Hagen, in Westphalia, when the Pastor defended himself, and showed that he had said nothing concerning the Romish Church which was not sustained by the Scriptures and the Confessions of the Established Church of Prussia. But his defense was unavailing; both he and the printer of the sermon were condemned to imprisonment—he fourteen days, and the printer seven days.

This case has awakened much interest even in America, and has furnished a text for several newspaper homilies on the persecuting spirit of the complaining Roman Catholic Church. The homilies grow very naturally out of the text, and we have no fault to find with them. But in reading them, we have been reminded of the case of the German Seventh-day Baptists of Pennsylvania, who were fined and imprisoned for a breach of the Sunday statute of that State, notwithstanding it was shown that they had done nothing contrary to the Word of God; and we have been led to inquire, Why so much sympathy, on the part of these papers, for the persecuted abroad, and so little for the persecuted at home? The answer undoubtedly is, that these home persecutions originated with nominal Protestants, while those in Prussia originated with Roman Catholics. Truly, "circumstances alter cases."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Another Prince—Sunday Opening—Jewish Disabilities—Education—The Pope and the Emperor—Papal Aggression.

GLASGOW, April 8th, 1853.

Our city bells are ringing merrily—the telegraph having intimated the birth of a Prince yesterday, and the Queen and infant doing well. If he ever reign, much grace will he require, if, as we fear, it be in troublous times.

Great zeal continues to be manifested in getting up petitions to Parliament for preventing the opening of the Crystal Palace on Sunday—more reliance being placed by the church on the numbers opposing than on the Scriptural evidence for Sunday sanctification. One petition is being subscribed by London surgeons, physicians, and practitioners, on the ground of a necessity of a seventh portion of time being required for rest to man, (without reference, of course, to the blessing or purpose of God in the Sabbath.) Some of those who have been most zealous in urging the propriety of sanatory measures, have refused to give their signatures, considering that an occasional visit to such scenes must be "very good, both for the bodies and the minds of the humbler classes."

This day the Jewish Disabilities Bill is intended to be read a third time in the House of Commons. There is little reason to doubt that it will be carried there, as it has been formerly; but its fate in the Upper House is problematical.

In the beginning of the week, Lord John Russell obtained leave to bring in a Bill on Public Education. His lordship stated it to be a measure extending the aid already granted to schools. Government considers that religion should be taught, and proposes that the corporation of municipal burghs should have power to impose a rate for schools—but that two-thirds of the Town Council, in such cases, agree to the imposing of the rate—that such rate be not to establish new schools in substitution of those already existing, but in aid of the voluntary efforts of individuals, and what is contributed by parents, so that twopence per week may be supplied by the rate for each scholar, provided that threepence or fivepence be contributed from other sources—that these schools be such as might, under the former minutes of Council, receive Government assistance, as approved in plan. In regard to Charity Schools under Trust, a judicial power is proposed to be exercised, by a Committee of Council, where the Trust has been abused, for remedying the evil and superintending the administration of the Trust, either with consent of the Trustees, or, where this is refused, by Act of Parliament. With regard to the Universities, Government has a decided opinion, that admission to them should be made more free and general. But, in the mean while, it is to be left to the Universities themselves to consider the recommendations contained in the Report of the Commission of Inquiry into their state—although his lordship stated it to be the belief of Government, that it is desirable that considerable alteration be made in the constitution of that of Oxford.

It is now confidently stated, that the Pope is not to crown the French Emperor—and it is added, by some accounts, that the reason is, that the Emperor would not agree to the demand made in consideration of so important a privilege. So this is the result, after all the tampering with religious liberty which has so long been going on in France. Concession after concession has been made to a priesthood who are, and ever have been, insatiable in their demands, until they have been enabled to exterminate those whom they are pleased to term "heretics and schismatics!" But they have read ill both civil and religious history, who could not previously have said, that Pope and priests would stop short of this only if policy seemed to require present contentment with less, until they should thereby be better able to demand more.

Holland is beginning to stir, to prevent, if possible, papal aggression. The last Allocution of his misnamed Holiness, announces the restoration of the Roman hierarchy in the Netherlands. On the 3d inst., a meeting of the Reform Community at Utrecht voted an address to the King, which has been signed by 4528, recalling to his remembrance their struggles at the time of the Reformation for the acquisition and maintenance of religious liberty, and the danger to which it is thus again exposed, and praying him to refuse allowance of titles, which, on being granted, exact an oath from those on whom they are conferred to persecute Protestants. Other towns are preparing to follow this example.

The Madiai, we have just learned, are offered an asylum, by the King of Prussia, in his territories; but it is thought that they will prefer taking up their abode in this country.

MISSION OF YOUTHFUL SABBATH-KEEPERS—NO. 3.

What does it cost to be a Sabbath-keeper?

It costs a greater sacrifice of worldly interests—of goods, greatness, and renown—to become a thorough-going Seventh-day Baptist, than it does to become a member of any other evangelical denomination. While an individual can become a member of most other denominations, at the present day, without sacrificing many of his worldly privileges or prospects—without being subjected to any great inconvenience—he cannot become a Sabbath-keeper without foregoing many conveniences and privileges—without denying himself many civil, literary, and pecuniary prospects and chances of ease, honor, and greatness, and subjecting himself to trials and difficulties resembling somewhat those of the early Christians.

Whenever individuals, or a class of individuals, differ so much in sentiment from the rest of the world, as to lead to diversity of practice, it creates inconvenience. As this diversity increases, the difficulties increase, so that it frequently requires great self-denial—great sacrifices—to adhere to one's principles. In such cases, there are but few that will cling steadily and unflinchingly to what they deem right, regardless of trial and temptation. Most men prefer to float down stream with the multitude. Some, it is true, look wistfully, anxiously, up stream, but have not courage to row against the current, while, now and then, a few dare to beat manfully against wind and tide. Such are those that cling earnestly to truth, despite all opposition.

Seventh-day Baptists are, professedly, of that number. They persistently contend for truths that long since became unpopular—raise from the dust a Law that has long been trodden under foot.

In carrying out these sentiments into practice, they are led to worship while others work. From this and other allied causes, they find themselves separated from the rest of the world, not only in sentiment, but also by practical differences—differences that affect not only their religious practices, but also their secular, every-day employments.

The farmer, if surrounded by a Sunday-observing community, cannot carry on his farming operations to so good advantage, as if he kept Sunday. The merchant has his doors closed on the day when all the world goes to market, except Sabbatarians, Jews, and Mahomedans. The mechanic, if he is a journeyman, and seeking business without the denomination, finds the best places closed against him, and, generally, where he can obtain work, he has to lose one day each week. If he is doing business for himself, and wishes to live, he cannot go out into the broad world, and make his selections on an equal footing with others. He has either to take up with second-rate hands, that cannot so readily find employment elsewhere—to pay for work he does not get—to depend on his own denomination for the supply—or compromise his religious principles, by permitting his workmen to prosecute their labor upon the Sabbath. Copartnerships cannot be formed with those observing different days, without meeting great difficulties or the sacrifice of principle. The monied interests of the world are against us. Ships and steamboats and railroads and telegraphs, as far as their practical workings on the Sabbath are concerned, are all against us. Cities and commerce and manufactures and all of the more active interests of trade, are continually fighting against us, undermining our foothold in places of business, eating us out—driving us back into by-places, quiet rural districts, or, as a dernier resort, to the mountains. The same holds true in respect to those seeking literary, civil, or political promotion and influence. Every one preparing for the higher duties of life by appropriate intellectual culture, has a long and arduous road before him. A Sabbath-keeping youth has superadded difficulties. Having but a scanty literature—no Theological Seminary, no College, or scarcely an Academy, of our own, we suffer, in our educational pursuits, opposition, privation, and temptation, experienced by but few. After having completed our preparatory education, we find but a comparatively limited field wherein we can act without great inconvenience or sacrifice of principle. Some of our young men, for instance, are looking forward to the law, as the field wherein they are to win renown. Such have very dubious prospects before them. They will have to play the fool with their consciences, or else, in most cases, be content with mediocrity of glory. Not but that in extraordinary circumstances they may rise to stations of honor, but the chances and influences are against them. They may fill the post of country or village pettifoggers, without any great inconvenience; but, in our higher courts of justice, there will be such frequent collision between Saturday court sessions and duties, and Sabbath observance, that they will have, for the most part, to content themselves as briefless attorneys, or else give up our Sabbath principles. How would a Sabbath-keeper manage as a judge in circuit and supreme courts, or as attorney general? Those seeking political offices, will meet with like difficulties. Town offices and the like may be held without much inconvenience, but in passing to higher offices the difficulties will increase. Although they may, now and then, obtain some county office, or seat in some State Legislature, it is in vain to dream of Congressional seats and Gubernatorial or Presidential chairs. These require too much sacrifice or searing of conscience, in the present state of society, for a Sabbath-keeper even to dream of. The profession of medicine presents not quite as many drawbacks, from the fact that healing of the sick is considered a kind of holy business—a business very appropriate for the Sabbath, but on this very account there arises one evil—that of tending to obliterate all Sabbath distinctions. The profession of teaching possesses similar difficulties. It is true, that in most of our primary schools, at the present day, there being generally but five days of school each week, more of an equal chance for competition is presented. Yet, after supplying the few within the range of the denomination, a Sabbath-keeper, in order to teach in other places, has to take upon himself a kind of religious exile, having generally to half way observe two days in succession, but not fully enjoying either. In higher institutions of learning, the difficulties are increased.

Most of the difficulties which we have thus far mentioned, arise from the very nature of the relations we sustain to the world—from relations voluntarily assumed, hence not to be charged upon any one as a fault; but there are obstacles which we have to encounter, that are not inherent in our relations. We frequently find ourselves subjected to unjust and oppressive laws. Like all small and feeble organizations that come out in opposition to the generally received opinions of mankind, we are the subjects of a most severe and unrelenting prejudice. Prejudice is connected with and woven into the other difficulties mentioned, increasing their power to a degree far beyond what they would otherwise possess.

There results from these various opposing influences, strong temptations to waver from the straight and narrow path of right. Conscience is often sacrificed to convenience and mammon. We are strongly tempted to yield the sanctity of the Sabbath for the advantage of business facilities, that are increasing around us. Many, for instance, are under strong inducements to make a car or steamboat their sanctuary, where, quietly reposing, they can con their well-worn Bibles, and lift their devotional hearts to Heaven, while their bodies are bound on errands of money and trade. And at the close of the Sabbath, as they reluctantly tear their thoughts away from the contemplation of heavenly and divine things, they find themselves a hundred or two of miles from the place where their devotions commenced, having made, perhaps, as many cents by the operation, which is a great quieter of a disturbed conscience. Some are induced to form copartnerships and matrimonial alliances, in which they contrive, by a sort of divorce and marriage process, performed fifty-two times a year, to throw off the responsibility of companionship and property relations during the Sabbath, to be resumed again as soon as the sacred season is past. By this means, we are enabled to worship while our companions, servants, and property, are at work. We drop tears of penitence and love in the sanctuary, while at home there is dropt for us the sweat of toil. While we are uttering songs of praise and thanksgiving, bone and muscle are rolling out for us the glittering dollars. While our hearts are swelling with holy emotions and affections, under the influence of the preached word, our purses are swelling with the gain of Sabbath desecration. The Lord commands us to do all of our work in six days; but we have added a proviso in favor of copartnerships, traveling, and the like, by which we find added much of convenience and prosperity. There is, however, one very significant fact connected with this proviso. It is this: The proviso rarely ever remains in force longer than one generation, for the children of those who have adopted it, generally find it much more convenient to draw a line across proviso, commandment, and all, thus obliterating all Sabbath distinction, or else adroitly changing the command so as to read first instead of seventh day. This is not a matter of surprise, for it is but the logical sequence deduced from the premises laid down by their fathers. The conclusions are perfectly legitimate. They are but perfecting in strength and fullness what their parents commenced in weakness. The results are nothing but what common sense teaches us to expect. Those parents who are so extremely anxious that their children shall be greatly prospered in their worship at the shrine of mammon, who so sedulously and anxiously scrape together a few dollars to bequeath to their children, need not be surprised if they find their children adopting those Sabbath observances that will best conduce to the enjoyment and improvement of their property.

Many are the temptations presented to us by agencies, stewardships, clerkships, commissions, governmental offices and emoluments, stations of trust and profit, literary and scientific promotions. Their glittering prospects cannot be easily and fully enjoyed as long as we cling to the Sabbath. Our young men, in common with most of their parents, are desirous of advancement, promotion, and profit; hence some speedily and daringly reject the teachings of the Bible, and promptly, unreservedly, enter the scramble for office and pelf; others, with the same desire, but more caution, endeavor to compromise by a half-way, formal observance of outward ceremonies; while some enter business with the sincere determination to keep the Sabbath unchanged, making it a delight and honorable, but the scenes amid which they enter soon blunt the edge of their good resolutions, and, gradually becoming accustomed to different observances, they are led, by degrees, to fall in with and adopt them. They first hate, then endure, then yield and embrace.

From these and various other like causes, we find ourselves continually weakened and reduced. We are yearly losing numbers of young men of talent and promise, young men of business tact and ability, young men of fine literary acquisitions, and capacity for doing much good. The number of youth that we are thus adding to the ranks of those that observe no day, or to the ranks of Sunday observers, greatly exceed those added to our number from those ranks. Thus we remain as heretofore, numerically, one of the smallest and weakest of evangelical denominations.

There are two ways by which men forsake the communion in which they were educated—one by indifference, moral frivolity, or death—the other by growth, advancement. In the one case we change through neglect, degeneracy, or self-interest—in the other through conviction, aspirations after a higher and purer life—a desire for a closer walk with the true, the right, and the good, by which we outgrow the forms of education, and seek a purer communion, and a holier worship. If those who have left have been guided by the latter principle, we should rejoice with them in their advancement—if they have been guided by the former, we can but lament their spiritual degeneracy. While those who have been added to our number from other denominations, have generally been of those earnestly seeking truth and a holier life, and have manifested the same in their future walk and conversation, what shall be said of those who have left us? By their fruits they may be known. Having, generally, left for the sake of bettering their worldly interests, their future life has but too frequently corresponded with such motives.

MACOM.

DEATH OF THE VICE-PRESIDENT.

Hon. William Rufus King, long a Senator of the United States from Alabama, lately chosen Vice-President, died of consumption, at his plantation, near Cahawba, Ala., on Monday, 18th inst., aged 68. Mr. King had been longer in Congress than any man remaining in it since the death of Mr. Clay. He was a native of North Carolina, and elected thence to the House of Representatives, where he first took his seat in Dec., 1811. Mr. King remained a Representative from North Carolina till 1816. At the close of this session, he resigned his seat and removed to Alabama, then a Territory, soon to become a State, and was soon after chosen a member of its Constitutional Convention. On its admission as a State, he was chosen (in 1819) one of its U. S. Senators, which post he held uninterruptedly till 1844—a period of 25 years. He then resigned his seat on being appointed Ambassador to the Court of France, where he spent some years. In 1848, having relinquished his Mission, he was reëlected to the Senate, and continued to serve therein until the session of last winter, when the progress of consumption compelled him to leave Washington for Cuba—in vain. He remained on the island for two months or more to no purpose, and then, finding recovery hopeless, hastened home to die.

By the death of Mr. King, the office of Vice-President devolves (until his term expires, or the Senate see fit to choose another President) on Hon. David R. Atcheson, Senator from Missouri.

"THE BRICK CHURCH."

On our fourth page to-day will be found a statement relative to the proposed removal of one of the old land-marks of New York, commonly known as the Brick Church. The Independent, after setting forth the facts in the case, raises the question of the right of the church to remove as they propose—a question upon which, we doubt not, most persons not pecuniarily interested in the matter will take the view here indicated:—

"We have one simple question to ask, viz., What right, save that which is recognized in the stock jobbing of Wall-street, have Dr. Spring's people to make such an application to the Common Council of New York? This question involves others. How came they possessed of this property? Did they purchase it with their own money? Did they pay for the bricks and mortar which form the walls of the Brick Church? Did their fathers give this property to them by devise? These questions, if we mistake not, must be answered negatively. By what right, then, except such as that by which Broadway railroads are granted, do the present occupants of the Brick Church undertake to put $200,000 in their pockets by the sale of that property? The property was granted to the Rev. Mr. Rogers by the city, nearly an hundred years ago: granted expressly and solely for church purposes, and on that account allowed to be held free of taxes, on condition of the payment of the annual pittance of fifty-two and a half dollars. It was not granted for the benefit of Mr. Rogers and his successors, nor for the benefit simply of Mr. Rogers' or Dr. Spring's congregation, but through them for the benefit of all who might be resident in that vicinity. Ethically and rightfully, therefore, Dr. Spring's elder who has his mansion far up town, has no more claim to the Brick Church property than the porter or the drayman who ~~lives in some~~ cellar or attic in Beekman or Nassau streets. There never was more need of a church on that spot than there is now. There is a larger population within five minutes walk of the Old Brick today than there ever was before. If, then, Dr. Spring's people, the wealthy, and the elders who rule well, but who, by force of circumstances, are compelled to live in Bond street or Union Square, wish an edifice for worship in that part of the city, let them put their hands in their pockets, and, out of the abundance which the Lord has given them, build a suitable structure; but let them not take the children's bread and give it to dogs; let them not leave hundreds and thousands to famish for the bread of life; let them not give up to mammon what was dedicated to God; let them not worship, or pretend to worship, in their splendid up-town pile, at the expense of the suffering and needy whom they have left behind. There ought to be forever more, on the time-honored site of the Old Brick, a noble structure for the purposes of religious worship, which should look out upon the confluent tides of business and pleasure which circle there, as Trinity Church, sentinel-like, looks down the great moneyed street of this continent."

BAPTIST MISSION RECEIPTS.—The Corresponding Secretary of the American Baptist Missionary Union says that the receipts of the Union for the year just closed were upwards of $134,000, which will meet its expenditures, less $1,500.

ACCIDENTS LAST SABBATH.—Last Sabbath, April 23d, the two o'clock train from Philadelphia to New York, by the Camden and Amboy Railroad, on reaching Rancocas Creek, about twelve miles from Philadelphia, found the draw-bridge up for the passage of a steamboat; and no sufficient notice of the fact being given the engineer in season, the engine, all the baggage crates, and the express car, were thrown into the water, there about fifteen feet deep. The passenger cars, fortunately, became disengaged, and their progress stopped, in season to save them from following. The engineer escaped by leaping from the locomotive. One brakeman was less fortunate, both his legs being broken. A young man named Wm. Woolley had his foot crushed. The express car, with all its contents, was sunk completely out of sight. It had some $30,000 on board. The mails, with most of the passengers' effects, were recovered.

In New York, last Sabbath, April 23d, about five o'clock in the afternoon, a boy six years of age, named James Wilson, whose parents reside at No. 509 Eighth-avenue, was run over, at the corner of Thirty-seventh-st., by one of the Eighth-av. Railroad cars, and almostly instantly killed. One of the wheels passed over the boy's head, and crushed it so that the brains were scattered over the track.

On the same day, and at nearly the same hour, a scaffold erected on the outside of the house No. 12 Vesey street, New York, upon which three men were engaged in painting, gave way, and all fell to the pavement. One of them was instantly killed. George Hutchinson, another of the unfortunate men, had his skull fractured; and Michael Kennedy, the third, had his right ankle broken.

Had these three accidents happened on Sunday, no doubt they would have been made the occasion of numerous newspaper articles, if not pulpit discourses, on the heinous sin and imminent danger of running railroad trains and painting houses on that day. But happening as they did on Saturday, the seventh day, the Sabbath, the lesson they teach will probably be received in silence.

JUDGE JAY AND THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.—In response to a circular asking for a donation, Judge Jay has written a long letter to the Corresponding Secretary of the American Tract Society, giving the reasons why he can no longer aid it. The following extract contains the gist of the matter:—

"It seems your tracts must meet the approbation of all evangelical Christians. If we ask who these are, we shall be told, such as agree in maintaining the Scriptural authority of certain abstract doctrines. But we all know, that these same Christians differ widely on various questions of moral practice. You are not ignorant that evangelical wine and rum sellers, and drinkers abound both in town and country; and yet your Society is lavish of its censures on them. It condemns the theater and race-course, although not a few believers in the evangelical creed frequent both. You issue publications against dancing, and yet how many sons and daughters mingle in the waltz, in the presence and with the consent of their evangelical parents? You condemn traveling on the Sabbath, yet our Sunday steamboats and rail-cars are not without their evangelical passengers. You do not hesitate to rebuke gambling, yet evangelicals may be found at the card and the billiard-table. As far as I can judge, the publications of your Society have been in accordance with the rule you announce on few subjects, except that of human bondage and its attendant atrocities. I know not that in the twenty-seven years of its existence the Society has published a line intended to touch the conscience of an American slave-breeder or trader. On the contrary, especial care has been taken to EXPUNGE from your reprints every expression that could even imply a censure on our stupendous national iniquity."

RETURN OF THE JEWS TO PALESTINE.—A lecture upon this subject, by a Jewish convert and missionary named Steiner, was delivered in the lecture-room of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, on the evening of Sixth-day, April 22. The lecturer claimed that there are 250 passages of Scripture, written by eleven different men, which promise or imply that the Jews will return to their own land; and as all the other promises and threatenings of Scripture which relate to the Jews have been literally fulfilled, he insisted that these also must be literally fulfilled. At the present time, he stated, the Jews of Europe consider the day their of restoration near, and are raising funds to send persons forward to till the land.

We wonder if the Jews, when they return to their own land, will follow the example of Mr. Steiner in keeping the first day of the week instead of the seventh for the Sabbath? As Mr. Steiner is very much of a literalist, and especially interested in studying those portions of Scripture which relate to the future of the Jews, perhaps he can give some scriptural light on this subject, which we should be happy to receive.

THE CHRISTIAN REVIEW.—The April number of this valuable quarterly, published by Colby & Ballard, 122 Nassau-st., New York, has a variety of articles suited to the character of the work. Though a Baptist Review, it has contributions from some of the best scholars of other denominations. The leading article is by Rev. Dr. Curry, Methodist, of Hartford Ct., on Wickliff. The other subjects treated of are Baptizo, Model Preacher, Classical Studies, Vulgate, Egyptian Archeology, Weekly Communion, the Haldanes, and a large amount of literary intelligence.

THE BIBLIOTHECA SACRA, and American Biblical Repository, for April, has nine articles, viz: A continuation of Bretschneider's Autobiography, Interpretation of Job 28th, Lucian and Christianity, Riley's Plautus, Humane Features of Hebrew Law, the Idea of Preaching, Alexander's Moral Science, Notices of New Publications, and Select Theological and Literary Intelligence. Published by W. F. Draper & Brother, Andover, Mass.

General Intelligence.

A Prison and Dead-House.

The New York City Prison was the scene of a sad tragedy on Sunday night, April 17th. Six men, most if not all of them weakened and broken by habitual drunkenness, were shut up together in a cell in the first story. An hour and a half after they were confined, the Watch visited the cell, when one of them was found dead, and the corpse removed. On a later visit, at 11 o'clock, another was discovered in convulsions, but on being carried to the hospital he revived. The next visitation was at 5 o'clock on Monday morning, and then, of the four remaining prisoners, one was found already dead, and three in convulsions, from which but one recovered. The number of victims was four. The Coroner, aided by the physician of the prison and two other doctors, held an inquest, and rendered a verdict that the men died of convulsions caused by intemperance.

In consequence of a general impression that the condition of the cell in which these men were confined had something to do in causing their deaths, the Grand Jury undertook to investigate the case, and in their Presentment announce the following conclusion:—

"The testimony before the Grand Jury was clear and unequivocal, that their deaths were the result of suffocation, produced by carbonic acid gas, one of the most deadly agents of human destruction. On visiting the cellar immediately beneath this range of cells, the atmosphere was found to be so tainted as to render immediate retreat necessary. Other cells on the same corridor were shown to be highly offensive, and the arrangement of the pipes communicating with the various cells in all the corridors so defective, that at times the effluvia pervades the entire prison. The Grand Jury present the building, in its present condition, as a Public Nuisance, and they request that unless an immediate remedy be provided by those who are charged with this duty, the matter be laid before the next Grand Jury with a view to the indictment of those who by law are responsible for the continuance of so foul a stigma on the honor of this City."

A Touching Case.—Died, at Oberlin, O., April 10, of consumption, Lee Howard Dobbins, a colored child about four years old, a fugitive from slavery, who had been brought to that place a few days previous from Kentucky, in the last stages of consumption. The Oberlin Evangelist gives the history of his brief life:—

"His mother died two years since, but in her last hour committed this little one to the compassionate care of a fellow-slave-mother, by whom he was brought here to die. He had a father—but of him humanity makes no particular account. He was one of those fathers who own property in the flesh and bones of their children, to whom therefore a sick and dying boy is a valueless thing. His natural mother seems never to have thought of such a father as a protector of her child. Instinctively she turns for human sympathy and help to a sister slave-mother—and not in vain. The latter promptly accepted the trust, and heroically did she fulfill it. She nursed the feeble one along with the other little ones of her fold, till the hour came to strike for freedom, and then, with a babe of her own on one arm, and this sick helpless one on the other, she bade her other children follow, and fled. A Hand more than human guiding and sustaining, they were set down among us, in safety. The little sick one could go no farther. With many bitter tears this mother by adoption tore herself away and left him here, till God opened his Great House of Refuge, and took the fugitive orphan home. Upon this community it devolved to perform the last offices of sympathy for the orphan boy, and not often has such a call been responded to more promptly. More than one thousand persons were present at this funeral."

University of Wisconsin.—This young State is making honorable provision for the liberal education of its citizens. The appraised value of the University lands is $170,000. Since last October, sales have been made to the amount of $21,331 84, which added to $25,000 previously realized, amounts to $46,331 84, productive fund. They anticipate an annual sale of $10,000, every dollar of which becomes immediately productive. It has now in operation a preparatory and collegiate department. The faculty consists of the Chancellor, two Professors, and a Tutor. The institution has one college building completed and occupied, and another begun. It allows the German and French languages to be substituted, in a part of the course, for the classical. The Board are of opinion that a Normal School, and a School of Science as applied to Agriculture and the Arts, in addition to the ordinary professional schools of Law, Medicine, and Theology, should enter into a plan of a University.

A Curious Case.—An exchange paper states that about 19 years ago a Mr. Hait, of Wilton, in Fairfield County, Conn., then a remarkably good student in his collegiate course, was suddenly deprived of his reason and memory. Under these circumstances, his father, Rev. Mr. Hait, sent him to Hartford, but finding no relief, he sent him to Dr. Chaplain, of Cambridge, Mass. The doctor said there was no present relief for him, but at the age of thirty-six or thirty-seven there would be a change; that the brain was too much expanded for the cranium, and there would at that age be a contraction, which would enable it to act healthily. His anxious father and family saw their hope peremptorily deferred for nineteen years. That time has recently expired, and to their great joy, the prophecy is fulfilled. The man began to inquire for his books as if he had just laid them down, and resumed his mathematical studies where he left them. There was no trace on his mind of this long blank in his life, of any thing which had occurred in it, and he did not know that he was almost forty years of age.

It is stated that the collections made on Easter Sunday, in the various Romish churches of the city, in behalf of the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylums, amounted to $5068 41.

European News.

London dates to April 8th have been received. We give a summary of the news.

The Queen gave birth to another son, at Buckingham Palace, at a quarter past 1 o'clock P. M. of 7th inst. Mother and child are as well as can be expected, &c.

Eight or ten vessels went ashore in the English Channel, on the French and English coasts, in a fog on Wednesday morning, 6th inst. Most of them are complete wrecks. Six lives were lost.

At a meeting of the Royal Flax Society of Ireland, held on 30th ult., the Secretary reported that a gentleman had waited upon him, deputed by the Colonial Government of Canada, to study the new process of flax culture and preparation, with a view to their introduction into Canada.

There is quite a civil, or rather *un*civil war raging at present in the Gallician Church, with an immense expenditure of ammunition, in the shape of pamphlets, sermons, speeches, attacks and retorts. The dispute arose respecting the comparative merits of the religious and civil ceremonies in the Sacrament of Matrimony, but has since spread to other subjects.

Preparations continue for the inauguration of Napoleon's tomb on 5th May. M. Thibault, Bishop of Montpelier, one of the most eminent orators of the French Church, is selected to deliver the oration.

The King of Prussia had offered the Madiai an asylum in his country, but it is thought they will prefer proceeding to England.

Eight persons were shot at Esongrad in Hungary, on 19th ult., for drinking with three notorious robbers—call them guerillas—instead of informing against them. A ninth person was shot at the same place, for abetting the escape of another "robber," by giving a false name to the gendarmerie.

The Government has offered a reward of 10,000 florins for the apprehension of the celebrated guerilla chief, Rozsa Sandor.

The mail-coach from Novara was stopped a few nights since, near Cigliaro, by an armed band of some twelve or fifteen robbers. The passengers having been made to alight, the robbers took possession of a box containing 12,000 francs in the Piedmontese coin.

The Austrian Embassy at Constantinople has presented another note to the Divan, complaining of maltreatment to the Christians of Dalmatia. The Porte promises inquiry into the matter.

California News.

Two weeks later news from California has come to hand.

The mystery relative to the steamship Independence is at length solved. On the 16th of February she ran ashore on the shoals off Margaretta Island—an uninhabited island on the coast of lower California. After striking, she backed off; but, finding eight feet of water in her hold, Capt. Sampson ordered the pilot to run her on the beach at a spot three hundred yards from land. There the ship took fire, from the intense heat of the furnaces, the flames spreading rapidly, and creating the most frightful consternation among the passengers. A very heavy surf was running, and all the boats of the steamer were swamped in trying to make the first trip ashore. To add to the horrors of the scene, the fire reached the powder magazine, which exploded with terrible force, shattering the steamer's stern, and scattering the fragments in every direction. Many of the passengers were blown into the sea, and others jumped in, and were immediately carried out to sea by the strong current that was sweeping from the shore. Those who succeeded in reaching the shore were unable to render any assistance to those struggling in the water, and were obliged to remain passive spectators of immense numbers of men, women and children perishing by fire and in the sea. There were about 500 passengers; and the number of persons lost has been variously estimated at from one hundred and forty to two hundred.

The passengers who were saved found themselves on an uninhabited island, without water, where they were compelled to remain for fifty-six hours in a state of intense suffering. Finally, by firing a cannon, they were enabled to attract the attention of some whaling vessels lying in Magdalene Bay, a few miles off, who came to their assistance, with provisions, and finally took them off.

The City of Marysville has been again inundated by a rise of the Feather and Yuba Rivers, and much loss of property had occurred.

The steamer California, which left San Francisco on the 1st of April, for Panama, took down $2,230,000 in gold dust.

The markets at San Francisco were quiet, in expectation of a change, owing to a large number of marine arrivals. Flour was at $12 and $13, with small sales. Mess Pork, $40, and Clear Pork $44. Hams 24 and 25c. Butter 43 and 45c. Rice 6 and 6½c. Lard 29 and 30c.

Reese Evans, a youth not yet nineteen years old, belonging to Carbondale, was convicted at Wilkesbarre, Pa., recently, of the murder of Louis Reese, a merchant at the latter place. Evans went to Reese's store, and purchased several articles of clothing, promising to pay for them as soon as he could go over and get the money of a man near Kingston. It was arranged that Reese should go with him, and so they started together. After they got over the Wilkesbarre bridge, it appears that they left the road and went across the fields. On the way Evans drew a pistol, shot Reese through the head, took his watch, and what money he had about him, and made off. Taken together, the case is almost unparalleled. At his conviction, the delinquent manifested no remorse, but protested most stoutly that he was innocent.

A correspondent of the New Haven Journal denies the accuracy of the assertion, that the deposit of lithographic stone lately found in Kentucky is the first discovery of that species of stone in the United States. The writer says that he obtained a specimen of the same kind of stone in 1825 at Drummond Island, at the entrance of the strait between Lakes Huron and Superior, where the supply was apparently inexhaustible. The stone was carried to Boston and tested by Mr. Pendleton, the lithographer, who said it was equal if not superior to the German stone. At that time, however, Drummond Island was far less accessible than Germany, and the discovery was therefore of no practical value.

SUMMARY.

Mr. C. K. Garrison, of the wealthy house of Garrison, Fritz & Co., of Panama, has been appointed Agent at San Francisco of the Nicaragua Transit Co. His compensation is 5 per cent. commission until the amount reaches $60,000 per annum. He is also Agent for four New York Insurance Companies at $10,000 per annum each. In addition to this, in order to secure the transit of gold by the Nicaragua route, Mr. Garrison has a letter of credit from three capitalists connected with that route for a million of dollars per month, the funds to be used only in the purchase of gold dust, and he has a quarter interest in the profits. Altogether, we should suppose an economical man with this business could make both ends meet.

A candy manufacturer in St. Louis has prepared an article for exhibition at the New York Fair which is not the least novel of the novelties that will be then and there collected. It is emphatically a picture in candy, being a copy of a boar hunt. The figures in the original, consisting of the hunters and their horses, the boar and the hounds, and even the grass and sky overhead, are represented with accuracy. The expression of the horsemen, the coloring, and all the minutiæ of the lithograph, are faithfully copied. The work was executed entirely by hand, by slow and tedious process.

The Peoria (Ill.) Republican states that a gentleman, who had been for some time paying his addresses to a young lady, asked her hand in marriage, which was refused. He pleaded for some time after, and that declared if she still resisted his suit he would commit suicide. She informed him such an alternative would not influence her in the least. At this he loaded a gun, and, standing in front of the house, placed the muzzle in his mouth, and with his toe pulled the trigger. The lady stood in the door and witnessed the whole of the terrible transaction.

An Englishman has invented what he calls "the curvilinear omnibus," comprising a number of improvements. The interior is ventilated above and beneath, and the windows are therefore fixed so as to prevent either rattling noise, or disputes about opening and shutting them. The back of each seat is curved outward, so that a greater width of passage is obtained. The feet sink into boxes to prevent treading on them. Between and above each seat is a bell pull acting on a single bell near the conductro's place. Access to the top is facilitated by steps.

A Philadelphia letter-writer expresses surprise that provisions remain so dear, while the markets of that city are so well stocked. On the 23d inst., poultry was scarce, chickens selling at from 75c. to $1 61 the pair. Good butter sold at 31 a 33 cents per pound; eggs 14 cents the dozen; tomatoes 31 a 37 cents per quart; asparagus 25 a 40 cents the bunch; radishes 5 cents the bunch; salad 3 a 8 cents the head. Young lamb sold at 37c. a $1 per quarter, and very fine. Squab pigeons were worth 31 cents per pair. Good ham, by the slice, commands 10 a 20 cents per pound.

A Convention was held at Newburgh a few weeks since, for the purpose of taking into consideration the road from that city to Syracuse. The meeting was attended by nearly 400 delegates from numerous towns in the interior of New York, who assembled for the purpose of taking preliminary steps toward the construction of a road from Newburgh to Syracuse. It was shown, to the satisfaction of all present, that the route was perfectly feasible, and could be constructed with moderate grades and at a moderate expense.

The Portland Advertiser says: "A fine fore-and-aft clipper-built schooner, of about 240 tuns burden, called the Jennette, launched from the ship-yard of Messrs. Turner & Harris, Cape Elizabeth, is now rigging at Franklin Wharf, in that city. She is owned by Jos. P. Tailor and Eldridge P. Talbot, (colored persons,) and is to have an entire colored crew, with Mr. Tailor for commander, and Mr. Talbot for first officer. She is intended for a freighter."

Some weeks since, Prince Paul of Wurtemberg, having returned from his third scientific exploration of our Western territories, in the course of which he added largely to his collections in Botany, Zoology and Mineralogy, sailed from this port on his way to the Straits of Magellan and Patagonia, for the purpose of exploring the extremity of the South-American Continent.

A wealthy Dublin watchmaker, named Donegan, is sending out to the New York Exhibition, among other things, a set of superb gold watches, as presents for the Irish political exiles, both those who still remain in Van Dieman's Land, and those who have escaped to America. Various national emblems, including the American eagle, together with the arms of the respective exiles, are emblazoned on different portions of the watches.

With a view of building the Chenango Valley Railroad, a meeting of three delegates from each town interested in the construction of a railroad connecting the Chenango Valley with the Central Line and New York and Erie Railroads, is called at Sherburne, on the 27th of April, 1853. The road is proposed to be built from Utica down to Chenango Valley, intersecting, we suppose, the Syracuse and Binghamton Road at Chenango Forks.

A bill has passed to its third reading in the Massachusetts House of Representatives, requiring each and all of the banks in the Commonwealth to constantly keep in their vaults an amount of specie equal to 10 per cent. of their capital, and that when from any cause the specie on hand shall fall below that proportion, all discounting shall cease until the requisite per centage shall be attained.

The vacant lots in the block between Fifth and Sixth-avs., and Ninth and Tenth-sts., New York, twenty-three in number, were sold the other day to Mr. James F. De Lanier for a sum in the neighborhood of $120,000. These lots are among the very best in the City in regard to quality and location. They were for a long time owned by the Bank of England, and were kept out of market by litigation.

At Williamsburg, the other day, a young man named William Ireland was sent to the County Penitentiary for 60 days, for drunkenness and vagrancy. His aged mother, who could overlook his many faults, begged of the Judge to let him off with a fine, which she would pay with her own hard earnings, but in consequence of his having been before the court several times before, her request was not granted.

A melancholy accident, resulting in the loss of the lives of two men, took place on Thursday night, April 21, at the Falls of Schuylkill, three miles above Philadelphia. Five men, who live at or in the vicinity of the Falls, went upon the river in a small row boat. They rowed about for some time, and were about returning to the shore, when the boat capsized, and two of the men were drowned before assistance could be procured.

The British Government has sent to Mr. Crampton, the British Minister, a gold medalion likeness of Queeen Victoria and a gold pocket chronometer for Captain Nye, of the steamship Pacific, and a gold mounted trumpet and £10 sterling for the mate, and £10 for each of the six men who volunteered their services, and saved the crew and passengers of the British bark Jesse Stephens, wrecked some time since.

A dispatch dated Boston, Tuesday, April 19, 1853, says, The publisher of Life in Boston was assaulted last night about 10 o'clock, within a few paces of his residence in Cambridge, by two ruffians in the employ of the Boston gamblers, and beaten and bruised until he was supposed to be lifeless. A slung shot was employed, and there is no doubt they intended to kill him on account of his exposure of the galvanized prop tables.

The Michigan University announces a free Course of Lectures on Agricultural Science, commencing April 27th, and closing June 28th. Rev. Charles Fox, (Ed. 'Farmer Companion,') will lecture on Theoretical and Practical Agriculture; Prof. S. H. Douglass on Climate, Geology, Mineralogy, Meteorology and Chemistry; Prof. A. Sayer on Vegetable and Animal Physiology, &c., &c. (Board at Ann Arbor, $1 50 to $2 per week.'

The Trustees of the old State Bank of Illinois, have advertised in the St. Louis papers the remaining lands of their trust to be sold without reserve, and as it is doubtful (says the Republican) whether enough will be realized from the assets of the Bank to pay all its liabilities, holders of its evidences of indebtedness would do well to attend the sale, either to buy property or sell their paper to purchasers.

The Pittsburgh Visitor learns that recently a passenger in the accommodation train on the Pennsylvania Railroad, told the conductor he had no money to pay his passage, but wished him to permit him to come to Pittsburgh. This the conductor refused, when the poor man made no further remark. The cars were stopped and he expelled. He sat down on the road-side, dropped his head upon his knees, and died instantly.

About sixty Californians, who left N. Y. last week for home, met at the St. Nicholas Hotel, on the invitation of Mr. Samuel Brannan, and partook of a sumptuous dinner. Senators Gwin and Weller, Mr. McCorkle, Mr. Thomas O. Larkin, Ex-Gov. McDougal, Ex-Mayor Harris, and several members of the California Press, were among the company.

At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the American Temperance Union, on the 18th inst., many grateful emotions were felt that from the Office there had been sent out over the land, in the last year, more than 700,000 Maine Law Tracts; and a resolution was adopted, to make a special effort to raise $2,500, and engage in more enlarged operations.

There were 1,614 first-class passengers carried over the Albany and Schnectady Railroad on the 19th inst., against 930 on the corresponding date of last year—an increase of 80 per cent. The entire business of the present month, it is believed, will exceed that of March, 1852, in nearly the same ratio.

A dispatch dated Buffalo, Friday, April 22, 1853, says: A severe thunder storm occurred here about 2½ o'clock this morning, during which the lightning entered the Morse Telegraph Office, destroying three instruments, and melting the gas pipes, set the office on fire.

The Reformer, published at Trenton, N. J., says that not less than four human beings were drowned in that vicinity last week, in consequence of indulgence in intoxicating liquors. Some of these victims left large families.

A girl, about fourteen years of age, who was at Sunday School April 16, in good health, undertook the next day to jump the rope 200 times without stopping. She did so, but the unnatural exertion threw her into an illness, which proved mortal.

There are more colored mechanics of the various trades in the United States and in Canada, than one would suppose. In 1830 there were 5,000; in 1840, 7,000; and in 1850 there were 9,070, including every kind of business that may be considered as a trade or handicraft.

The Zion Baptist church Cincinnati—colored—was founded ten years since, and has increased from thirteen members to over three hundred and fifty. Over eighty persons, during the past winter, have been added, through a revival—most of them young persons.

A large number of whales were seen off Southampton, L. I., on Monday, April 18. Two or three schooners from Greenport, and a number of small boats, chased them all night. One whale, making 20 or 30 barrels of oil, was captured by one of the small boats and sold for $800.

A dispatch dated Cincinnati, Wednesday, April 20, 1853, says: Father Baden, the first Roman Catholic priest ordained in the United States, died last night at the residence of the Archbishop, aged 98. He had been a priest over sixty years.

The surveys of the proposod Road from Kingston and Newburg, on the West bank of the Hudson, to Syracuse, are going forward with considerable spirit, and an influential combination is evidently forming on the line of the work, to carry the enterprise through.

A large meeting will be held at Seneca Falls, N. Y., to urge the construction of a Railroad from Sodus Bay, on Lake Ontario, through Seneca Falls, about 60 miles, to Ithaca, where it will connect with lines leading directly to New York City and Philadelphia.

The Centennial Celebration in Keene, N. H., is fixed for Thursday, 26th of May. Hon. Joel Parker, late Chief Justice of New Hampshire, and now Professor at Cambridge, will deliver the address.

A correspondent of the National Intelligencer announces the invention of a form of road and improved locomotives, which, he says, will safely transport the mails and passengers at the rate of one hundred miles per hour.

DIED,

In Adams, Jefferson Co., N. Y., on the 10th of April, Mrs. Alma Green, aged 23 years, 11 months, and 19 days. Sister Green was the wife of Mr. Delos Green and the daughter of Bro. Jesse Maxson, formerly of Berlin. It has never been my privilege to witness a more tranquil and triumphant sick or death bed. Until her last sickness, she had deferred engaging in the cause of Christ; but when disease was preying upon her, she commenced in good earnest to seek her Saviour. "They that seek shall find." Truly she found it so. Her disease was the slow working of consumption; but from the time of her conversion till her death, scarce a cloud ever darkened the bright prospect before her. Death lost its sting, and was to her a friend, not a foe. To the last, the smile of heavenly hope was upon her face, showing that however much her friends might mourn her death, she was well assured that all was well. Before she died, she entreated her friends to meet her in heaven. Nearly her last words were, "I am going home;" and, watching her own departing spirit as it left her body, dying she said to all, "Good-bye." J. S.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses, Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

"THE AMERICAN SLAVE CODE, IN THEORY AND PRACTICE: Its distinctive features shown by its Statutes, Judicial Decisions, and Illustrative Facts." By William Goodell, author of the "Democracy of Christianity," "Slavery and Anti-Slavery," &c. New York: American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 48 Beekman street. The work contains 430 pages 12 mo, neatly bound in cloth, and will be sold for cash at 75 cents single copy, $6 per dozen, and $45 per hundred. Also, in paper covers, at a deduction of 10 cents per copy from the above prices.

Orders may be forwarded to Lewis Tappan, 48 Beekman street, New York.

Extract of a Letter from Hon. Wm. Jay to the Author.

"Your analysis of the slave laws is very able, and your exhibition of their practical application by the Southern Courts, evinces great and careful research." "Your book is as impregnable against the charge of exaggeration as Euclid's Geometry, since, like that, it consists of propositions and demonstrations. The book is not only true, but it is unquestionably true."

Miscellaneous.

How a Ship is Launched.

When a ship is building, her keel rests on a series of blocks of wood, placed about three feet apart, and she is supported on either side by pieces of timber—one end of each "shore," as these timbers are technically termed, resting on the ground, and the other "shoring up" the ship, or, in other words, keeping her from falling over sideways. The ordinary practice in building ships is to place the stern next the water, and the head of the ship up the yard, so that the vessel shall go stern foremost into the river. When the launching time comes, the ship requires to be released from all these supports and barriers, and it may interest the country reader, at least, to explain how this is done.

First of all, large beams of timber are placed lengthwise under each side of the ship, with a slight inclination toward the water end of them. These timbers are bolted to blocks of wood in the ground, and they have other pieces of timber bolted to the sides of them so as to form "ways," as the shipwrights say, or grooves, by which the ship is to move into the water. The next process is to place another beam of timber on each of these "ways," and to bolt smaller pieces of timber upon them, which are fitted but not fastened to the ship's side, so as to form a kind of cradle in which the vessel is to rest, which goes into the water. The beams of timber fixed to the block are plentifully greased with soft soap and oil, to make the vessel move smoothly; and when all is in readiness, the supporters are knocked away, and the ship glides into the water.

The ship is liberated by striking down her "dagger," which is the last hinderance to taking the water. There is a "dagger," so called, at each side of the ship. It is just at the head of the launching timbers, and is simply a square piece of wood, placed in a slanting direction, one end of which rests against the fixed beams of timber which lie under the vessel, and the other end is placed against the cradle on which the ship rests. It is an honorable distinction in a ship builder's yard to knock down the daggers, and it is the custom to award the honor to the two oldest apprentices. Underneath the dagger a small piece of wood is placed on end, to prevent the dagger falling of itself; and a chisel is also driven into the wood to keep the "tom," as it is called, in its place. These are alike on both sides of the ship, and, as has been stated, it is the privilege of the two oldest apprentices to take charge of the department.

The real interest of a ship launch is a brief but exciting thing. It commences when the men lie along under the vessel, to "give her the rally," that is, to drive in a number of wedges to ease the ship off the blocks under her keel. A couple of hundred men may be about the ship in this work, and at the voice of the leading man, every one of them strikes his wedge at the same instant, gradually raising the ship, and producing a sound like muffled thunder. The centre blocks are then removed, and the shores taken away from the sides of the ship. The ship is now ready for launching, and the master ship-builder and his friends stand at the head of the vessel.

The men then place themselves down each side of the ways, the signal "out oakum" is given, and immediately the oakum, which has kept the dust from the grease, is removed. "All out, sir," is the response. "Out keys!" is the next command, and as quickly as in the former case, the men remove some small pieces of wood, which have been placed down the ways to assure them that all continues true. Again the men respond, "all out, sir," and they hasten from the sides of the ship. The whole interest is now in the daggers, both of which the master shipwright sees. "Out chisels," "out small toms," "down daggers," follow in rapid order, and the ship is freed from her restraints. A bottle of wine from the fair lady breaks on the ship's head, a big wave rises as she touches the water, enlarging itself as she gets off the stocks, and the ship is launched. [Boston paper.

Extravagance and Folly.

Men who were in New York in 1836, and saw the abounding "wealth," splendid equipages, brilliant furniture, magnificent parties, &c., &c., of that day—and who, a year or two afterwards, saw a large part of those foolish spendthrifts bankrupt and ruined—cannot avoid such reminiscences, when they see the far greater extravagance of the present day. They cannot help asking themselves if the end will not be the same. A New York correspondent of the Boston Transcript notes a few items of this extravagance.

"I find that in respect to extravagance in other matters, the New Yorkers are now in advance of all former times. The rage for showy and costly articles for private dwellings far exceeds the emulation which exists between the rival hotels up town. As a matter of curiosity to the readers of the Transcript, a few of the fashionable styles of parlor ornament will be stated.

One of the latest patterns of parlor tables or light stands, is made of the richest decorated French porcelain, set in a gilt frame and stand. These are very beautiful; the price ranges from $200 to $300 each, according to the value of the painting.

French porcelain ornamental gas fixtures for the mantel, are imported and sold for $180 a pair.

A pair of bronzed mantel candelabra, with a clock for a center piece, are for sale at $800 a set. An importer stated that he had sold four sets for one house at $3000.

A novel and unique mantel clock, valued at $500, would be a rich mantel ornament. This clock has no hands. The hour and minutes are denoted by figures which revolve, like a modern whist counter.

One firm here have a small mantel clock for which they ask $1200. Two birds come out and sing from the clock each hour.

Bronzed vases, with bas reliefs, are plenty at $300 each. Porcelain tea sets of thirty-six pieces are held at $180 a set. And so one could go through the list of household articles of elegance and utility, and name prices which would not do except in an 'age of gold.'

One cannot fail to call to mind the common illustration suggested by the uppish tendency of all property in this city, and to state that we are now witnessing the brilliant ascent of the rocket; the no less certain descent of the valueless stick may not be so agreeable, particularly if it should hit us, or one near to us.

There is one point which seems to be overlooked in the fitting up of public and private houses at the present time. This is the consideration of the effect of use and time upon the expensive ornaments and extravagant fittings now in vogue. There is nothing more repulsive to the eye than dingy or faded finery. Shabby gentility is generally despised. 'A patch on both knees and gloves on' is suggestive of a fall from competence to indigence. A dirty white vest is a sure indication that the wearer like the garment has seen better days. Twenty-four gas-burners in a bed-room twelve feet square; decorated porcelain spittoons, and seven hundred dollar bed-coverings, may excite wonder and attract for a time, but such matters are of short duration, from the very nature of things."

Slave-Market of Alexandria.

Writing from Alexandria, under date of January 13, 1853, Rev. J. P. Thompson of New York says:—

Early this morning we visited the slave market, which still exists in Alexandria as an open thing. It consists of a court-yard about 100 feet square, with rows of cells upon three sides, in which the slaves are kept until a purchaser is found for them. They are not kept in close confinement, but may go from cell to cell, and have the range of the yard. Several are huddled together into one apartment, and eat and sleep upon the naked ground. There were but a few slaves in the market and these were principally women and children. The children, too young to comprehend their condition, seemed happy as children are everywhere, but the adults wore an air of extreme dejection and misery. One in particular interested me exceedingly; she was a Nubian girl of about 16, jet black, with coarse features, and hair twisted into coils that stretched across her head about an inch apart, and resembled a rope mat; her only clothing was a piece of blue cotton cloth, not made into a garment, which hung from one shoulder about her waist to her knees; she was stout and hearty, but her countenance was as sad as any I ever looked upon, and in her nakedness and degradation she showed the native modesty of woman, by shrinking from the presence of strangers into the den allotted to her. I asked her price, and was told she could be purchased for $100. Perchance she was the daughter of some Nubian chief, whose misfortunes in war had doomed his family to slavery; no doubt she had a home, however rude—perhaps father, mother, brothers, sisters—from which she had been torn away forever. Slave-hunting is still carried on in Nubia and Abyssinia, and the slave-trade is still active upon the Nile. The principal market is Cairo. No Georgians or Circassians are brought to Alexandria, but they are still to be had at Cairo. Our guide informs us, however, that English gentlemen—whom he supposed us to be—would not be allowed to see them, "because English don't want to buy." Had he known the price demanded for the Edmonson girls in the United States, he might have thought differently of the marketable qualities of some fair Circassian in the eyes of some Americans. Ah, but to buy these girls here and carry them to America would be piracy by the laws of the United States; and so it is a felony condemned by all nations to steal them from their homes and transport them to Alexandria or to Cairo to be sold; but if they could only be smuggled into the slave market in that other Alexandria, to sell them to some lustful planter in Georgia or Louisiana, or for some brute in Arkansas, would only be carrying out "the compromises of the Constitution;" and to call that a crime might lead to the dissolution of the Union, besides damaging the cotton interest in New York. When shall that horrible slave traffic in the United States be brought to an end?

The Horse-Trade in New York.

The New York Agricultor has the following interesting account of the Horse-Trade of New York. It is from the pen of Solon Robinson, Esq., one of the Editors, and a good observer and judge of animals.

Wednesday, April 6, 1853.

We made a visit to the great market-place again last week. The day was generally clear and cool, but an occasional April shower drove operators under cover. We found the street unusually dull, and were told that the sales of the day probably would not exceed 15 horses. We find it impossible to obtain a correct account of the number sold here in a given time. Mr. Chamberlin, proprietor of the oldest established sales stables in the street, called Bull's Head Stables—the name is a misnomer for a place where nothing but horses are sold—estimates the daily average sales at this season of the year at fifty. Mr. Taylor, who has been a long time in the business, and appears to be a very intelligent, observing gentleman—he certainly is a good judge of horses, and has some beauties in his stable—says the sales during the months of April and May, and October and November, will average 500 a week, and 300 a week through the whole year. This would give 15,600 for the annual sales, which looks like a very large figure, and almost incredible. But our readers will take notice, that we find upward of 900 constantly on hand, and it is not very extravagant to suppose the weekly sales equal to one half that number.

Another stable owner, Mr. Beardsley, estimates the sales at 300 a week for the last six weeks. Mr. Campbell makes the same estimate for the past and next six weeks. A Mr. Shepherd, who says he has been familiar with this market for years, estimates the sales at an average of 40 a day. He says he has taken some pains to ascertain facts, and that the largest number of horses arriving in one day this spring is 85, and that 40 is a full average for the daily sales.

The general opinion is, that all the horses sold this season will average $175, as there are a good many high priced ones, which make up the average upon the whole. Very few, compared with the whole number, are sold for less than $100. Such as are below that sum in value, have no business here; their owners should keep them at home. The kind of horses mostly required for this market, are strong, substantial animals, suitable for double or single harness, and heavy work, traveling all day upon solid stone pavements.

Another very large class of horses are those suitable for stages and city railroads. These are not required to be as heavy or strong as cart horses, but more active, muscular, sinewy, and full of endurance; the work being constant, and sometimes, in slippery weather, very severe. No clumsy-footed animal can stand our Russ pavements in wet weather.

There is a large demand for a class of horses suitable for public carriages and light wagons; these must be docile, as they are often required to stand alone in the street; pretty good looking, or they would not draw custom, although they might the load; and capable of making a mile or two at a rapid speed. Great eaters are not appreciated in a city where all kinds of food are sold at such high prices as here.

These three classes are the horses which range from one to three hundred dollars each. To bring the latter sum, they must be very superior. Very few, except fancy horses, are sold at prices over two hundred dollars. If our readers have any of the latter, of extraordinary beauty, great speed, or any peculiarity so fanciful as to be utterly worthless, let them bring them to this market. For the latter be sure to ask an enormous price, and if you can't find a bigger fool than yourself to buy them, after you have spent all your loose change for their keeping, you can take them home again and sell them to some newly elected Militia Major, provided you cannot get yourself or your horse elected to that office. Good carriage-horses, or real fast trotters in single harness, will always sell well. We found some very fine carriage-horses in market to-day. One pair in Mr. Taylor's stable would suit our fancy exactly. They are handsome bright bays, not large, but full of life and strength. The price is $1,000. He has another pair at $1,200; a pair at $1,300, and a pair at $1,500, and a single horse at $1,200.

Northrup & Post have one pair at $1,500, and held one pair at $1,000, and several single horses at $300 and $400 each. The stables of these gentlemen are of brick, with a handsome front of over a hundred feet on Twenty-fourth-st., the rent of which is said to be worth $2,000 a year, though not covering as much ground as the stables of McCauly, who can put up the largest number of horses of any one in the street. The Bull's Head Stables are probably the next largest.

In Sargeant's stable we found one pair held at $1,000, and one pair at $2,000. Brown & Smith also have two high priced pair—$1,000 and $2,000. Campbell has one at $2,000 and one at $800; and Williams one at $1,000 and one at $700; Martin one at $1,000, and there are some other stables which hold horses well up in the hundreds.

It is said that horses are generally 10 per cent. higher than three years ago.

Taking the sales at 300 a week, at the average value of those now in stable, ($200) and we have $60,000 as the amount of weekly transactions. It propably exceeds rather than falls short of that sum, great as the amount may seem to those who have never visited the New York Horse Market.

The Alabama Wild Man.

The father of the "wild man" recently discovered in the neighborhood of Florence, Alabama, went after his son and took him home to Knox County, Tenn. The Florence Gazette, of April 9, thus describes the interview of the father and son: From the description, as well as from information received through a letter from our townsman, Mr. J. J. Craig, the old man was satisfied that it was his son, and although poor, feeble, and bent beneath the weight of sixty years, he set out for the purpose of finding, and reclaiming, if possible, his deluded son. He arrived in Florence on Wednesday morning last, nearly exhausted from fatigue and excitement. We were present when the old man was told of the finding and capture of his son, and the recital caused him to weep like a child. We voluntarily offered him our aid, and in company with the old man Goring, W. H. Hays, and A. P. Neeley, we set out for Bainbridge, at the foot of Muscle Shoals, where young Goring was stationed. On arriving, the old man hastened to where young Goring was standing. He offered him his hand, and asked him if he knew him. The son gazed at him, and answered, he did, and called him father, while the old man again wept as if his heart would break. They then had a long private conversation, and after some persuasion, the poor unfortunate man agreed to return home with his father. We came to town in company with the father and son, and the young man gave a very interesting history of his life, and the cause which induced him to withdraw from the world and seek the seclusion of the woods. He said that those he worked for would not pay him, and the world generally had treated him badly, and being naturally melancholy and retiring, he concluded to shut himself out from the world. He regretted his conduct, and said he would have come in long before he was caught, but was ashamed of the tattered garments he was clad in. He says his mind was never impaired, but he always shunned society, and had an involuntary shrinking at the approach of man, and this feeling had grown on him during his wild adventures in the woods. In company with his father, he left for home yesterday morning, and we trust he will soon see his aged mother, and other relations, who are now anxiously looking for his coming.

Price of Diamonds.

Rough diamonds, fit for cutting, are sold at £1 13s. 4d. to £2 the carat. A carat is rather more than three grains, and 156 carats equal to one ounce Troy. But if the stones are above one carat, the square of the weight is multiplied by the price of a single carat; so that, for example, a rough stone of three carats costs 3x3x £3 or £18. It is similar with cut diamonds; and in 1850 the purest brilliants of one carat brought more than £8, a brilliant of two carats 2x2x £8, or £32. When stones are over eight or ten carats, however, this is altered, so that they are valued still more highly. Diamonds of a quarter of an ounce weight are extraordinarily costly; but still larger are met with; and one of the largest known is that of the Rajah Mattum, in Borneo, which weighs nearly two ounces and a half; that of the Sultan of Turkey weighs two ounces; one in the Russian sceptre weighs more than an ounce and a quarter. The greatest diameter of the last is one inch, the thickness ten lines. The Empress Catharine II. purchased it in the year of 1772, from Amsterdam, and for it was paid £75,000, and an annuity of £650. Diamonds weighing an ounce exist in the French and Austrian regalia. One of the most perfect is the French, known as the Pitt or Regent Diamond. It was bought for Louis XV., from an Englishman named Pitt, for the sum of £135,000 sterling, but has been valued at half a million. One of the stones most renowned in the East, is the Koh-i-noor, or Mountain of Light, now in possession of the Queen of England. It came from Golconda to Persia, and while uncut weighed more than five ounces, but now, polished, only about two ounces. It is valued at more than £2,000,000 sterling. If we look only to the common mode of estimating the value, a perfect brilliant weighing half a pound, would be worth £20,000,000. Some have stated that such a diamond exists among the royal treasures of Portugal as large as a hen's egg; according to others this is only a topaz.

True Domestic Pleasure.

Dr. Forbes Winslow, speaking of marriage, says: "Nothing delights me more than to enter the neat little tenement of the young couple, who, within perhaps two or three years, without any resources but their own knowledge of industry, have joined heart and hand, and engaged to share together the responsibilities, duties, interests, trials, and pleasures of life. The industrious wife is cheerfully employing her own hands in domestic duties, putting her house in order, or mending her husband's clothes, or preparing the dinner, while, perhaps, the little darling sits prattling on the floor, or lies sleeping in the cradle, and everything seems preparing to welcome the happiest of husbands, and the best of fathers, when he shall come from his toil to enjoy the sweets of his little paradise. This is true, domestic pleasure. Health, contentment, love, abundance, and bright prospects, are all here. But it has come to be a prevalent sentiment, that a man must acquire his fortune before he marries, that the wife must have no sympathy nor share with him in the pursuit of it, in which most pleasure truly consists; and the young married people must set out with as large and expensive an establishment as is becoming those who have been wedded for twenty years. This is very unhappy; it fills the community with bachelors, who are waiting to make their fortunes, endangering virtue and prompting vice; it destroys the true economy and design of the domestic institution, and promotes inefficiency among females, who are expecting to be taken up by a fortune, and passively sustained, without any care or concern on their part, and thus many a wife becomes, as a gentleman once remarked, not a 'helpmate,' but a 'help-eat.'"

The Trick of Second Sight.

The Albion contains an article explaining the trick of "second sight." The imposition was first practiced in Paris six or seven years ago. It was introduced into England by Robert Houdin, who confessed it was all a trick.

The secret lies in a contrived system of words. The operator puts the question in such words as will indicate the answer. Suppose that figures are wanted. Certain letters indicate particular figures. If D stands for 4, Y for 9, the operator may say, "Do you know, &c., and the assistant at the other end of the room will give at once forty-nine. Of course the whole system is complex; and as explained in the Albion, is truly ingenious.

The mode of announcing objects is not so simple, and requires more effort and quickness in the operator. It consists in changing the meaning of all the letters in the alphabet, and in composing the question of words commencing with the letters which, in the alphabet, follow those which form the name in view. If the name of the object commence with C, the operator must employ a word beginning with D, and so on. Important intimations are given by the choice of the words. For example, the operator may vary the question, "Tell me what I read on this card," by many changes of words and forms of expression, any one of which has a distinct significance for the assistant. Much may be indicated by the use of tell, say, state, inform, discover, reveal, &c., &c. Indeed, the extent and capacity of the system is great. The devices to avoid ambiguity, and to denote a great variety of terms, are really wonderful. The writer intimates that such schemes are employed by accomplished gamblers.

Proposal to remove a Landmark.—"The Brick Church" has long been one of the landmarks of New York. There is now on foot a plan for its removal, to give place to trade. From a statement of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, it seems that the property was originally conveyed by the city to a Rev. Mr. Rogers, in 1766, eighty-seven years ago, subject to a ground rent which now amounts to $53 50 a year, and to the condition that the property shall be used exclusively for ecclesiastical purposes. The church wishes to sell, and with the proceeds of the property, which it is ascertained will amount to at least $250,000, to erect an edifice in a part of the city more convenient for the congregation.

This property contains eight full lots and a little over, in one of the most desirable parts of the city, and the Commissioners recommend, with the assent of the church proprietors, that it be put up at public auction, and be sold to the highest bidder, and that the city receive twenty-five per cent., or one quarter of the net proceeds. This is certain to amount to $56,250, at the least, which, at six per cent., would be $3,375 a year, instead of $53. It may, and probably will, amount to a good deal more.

The incidental advantages of this exchange to the city, are scarcely less substantial. This property is now, as church property, exempt from taxation. Supposing it to be sold for a quarter of a million of dollars, and another quarter of a million be added to it in the way of improvements, as there certainly would be at once, that would add half a million to the city assessment, and proportionately diminish the distributive burden of taxation upon the city, less only the price of the now unimproved lots which the church would probably purchase, and exempt from future taxation.

Planting Orchards.—In planting orchards, whether of apple, pear or peach, we recommend the following course:—Having prepared the ground, as before advised, by deep and thorough working, put out the trees a liberal distance apart, setting them no deeper than they stood in the nursery, and then plant the field with corn. Mark out the ground in such a manner as to plant each tree to stand in the place of a hill of corn, and in cultivating and hoeing treat the trees as corn, and give them as much attention as you do the growing crop. If you hoe once more than is common, no harm will result. Under this treatment the trees will grow apace and thrive.

The St. Albans, Vt., Messenger mentions the seizure, in that town, of four barrels of rum and brandy by the Sheriff, and the emptying of them in the street. It says: "Out of those four bung-holes ran murders, thefts, oaths, laziness, lunacy, rows, blows, headaches, degradation, poverty, red eyes, broken heads, tears, sorrows of children, rags, want, starvation, and all abominations. It is hoped that the loss of these things is not unconstitutional."

Common Schools in Ohio.—From the report of the Ohio Secretary of State, on the condition of common schools for the past year, we learn that the whole number of youth in the State is 833,669. The entire number of pupils enrolled, male and female, is 437,412. The average daily attendance during the year has been but 266,293. There are nearly 500,000 children who are entitled to attend these schools, but who do not! The difference between the number of pupils enrolled and the average attendance, is a still more painful fact. Either parents or teachers are in fault when less than five-eights of the scholars of all the schools in the State are present. It is a significant fact, that the enrolled number of boys exceeds that of the girls by more than 40,000. There are 9,916 schools, with 12,464 teachers, in the State, to the latter of whom $771,145 are paid as wages. 171 school houses have been built during the year, at a cost of $61,837.

Washes for the Bark of Fruit Trees.—The Working Farmer, in speaking of the inefficiency of lime wash, objects to it on account of its quick conversion from a caustic state to the state of carbonate, forming a hard crust upon the surface, and preventing the perspiration of the bark. Soap is recommended, on account of its well known mildness, and consequent safety of application, at the same time that it preserves its causticity for an indefinite period, assisting in the destruction of insects and their eggs, and softening and cleansing the bark, as each successive rain washes down a portion. A solution of soda (known as bleacher's soda No. 1,) is most strongly recommended for its power to cleanse, soften and render healthy the bark. For using, a pound is dissolved in a gallon of water. We mention these applications in order that our fruit raising readers may be able to give them a fair trial for a comparison of results.

Food for Chickens.—Boiled potatoes mixed with coarse Indian meal is, perhaps, the best food for fattening poultry. For laying hens, meat is necessary. Lime must also be within their reach at all times. Pepper has been found excellent to make hens lay. A recent writer says, "I was clearing out some red pepper seed, and threw the shucks promiscuously about. I soon observed hens picking them up and swallowing them with great avidity. They soon commenced laying eggs, though they had laid none for a month before. I feed regularly two or three times a week since then with red pepper, and they have never stopped laying, summer or winter, spring or fall, except while they were hatching their chickens; and I am confident that by this method hens may be made to lay the year around.

VARIETY.

Talents, which are before the public, have nothing to dread either from the jealous pride of power, or from the transient misrepresentations of party, spleen, or envy. In spite of opposition from any cause, their buoyant spirits will lift them to their proper grade. The man who possesses the great and vigorous stamina which entitles him to a niche in the temple of glory, has no reason to dread the ultimate result; however slow his progress may be, he will, in the end, most indubitably receive that distinction.

Sir Isaac Newton lost the use of his intellect before the animal frame was arrested by death. So it was said of M. Swissett, that he often wept because he was not able to understand the books which he had written in his younger days. Cornivus, an excellent orator in the Augustine age, became so forgetful as not even to know his own name. Simon Tournay, in 1202, after he had outdone all Oxford for learning, at last grew such an idiot as not to know one word from another, or one thing he had ever done.

The results of the Spirit Rappings in various parts of our country, as shown by the reports from the lunatic asylums, is, that there have been 573 lunatics, made lunatics by this delusion, and 17 suicides have been occasioned by it. How strange that in view of such facts, men and women will suffer themselves to be made the dupes of this folly, or even to tamper with it in any degree.

The widow's gift was of inestimable value as an example. It has probably brought more money into the Lord's treasury than any other instance of liberality on record. The rich from age to age have said, If this poor woman so pleased the Saviour by giving of her penury, how much does He require us to give of our abundance.

General Santa Anna landed at Vera Cruz on the first of April, and was received with the greatest enthusiasm—the firing of salutes and other demonstrations of joy. On the second, he issued a proclamation to the people of Mexico, in which he makes magnificent promises for the regeneration of his "beloved country." He started for the Capitol on the sixth inst.

On the 9th of April, about forty-five political prisoners, charged with insurrectionary attempts, were sent from Havana to Cadiz, to await the decision of the Queen. Among them were those victims who had been condemned to death, but were reprieved at the garotte on the 6th instant.

A lady was recently teaching a boy to spell. The boy spelt c-o-l-d, but could not pronounce it. In vain his teacher asked him to think and try. At last she asked him, "what do you get when you go out upon the wet sidewalk on a rainy day, and wet your feet?" "I get a licking."

A gentleman was accosted by a poor fellow who asked for chairity. "I will remember you next time," replied the gentleman. "Please your honor," said the beggar, "I don't give credit, I deal on the cash principle."

Integrity is the surest way of success in the long run. He who is underhanded may apparently prosper for a time, but during those years of seeming success, there is growing up in the public mind a distrust of him.

Huldah, wife of Col. Zephaniah Tucker, died at Woodstock, Ct., aged 98 years, on the 2d inst. Deceased, it is said, has left descendants in every State in the Union, thirty-seven of whom reside in Massachusetts.

Clergymen of all denominations are permitted to pass at half price on the Western Railroad, and also on the Connecticut River Road, went on their way to fulfill an appointment to preach, or to exchange with a brother clergyman.

THE LOGIC OF HEAVEN.

It is said of an eminent modern statesman, that being interrogated respecting his assent to the doctrine of the trinity in unity, by a Unitarian divine, he replied, "You and I, sir, do not probably understand the arithmetic of Heaven." The circumstance suggests the probability, that very many religious theorists are equally deficient in their understanding of the logic of Heaven. The great convincing argument which Heaven uses to vindicate the dignity of the Throne, is not theory merely, but an exhibition of love, by acts of unparalleled benevolence, in alleviating sorrow, consoling the afflicted, and meliorating the condition of humanity. Our Saviour "went about doing good." He was not a mere theorist, but was every where a practical exhibition of the holy religion he taught. And his apostles fully justified his position, by assuming that the religion of Christ was practical benevolence. "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the father, is to visit the widow and the fatherless in their affliction, and keep himself unspotted from the world." And true saints, in every age and country, have been actuated by this holy principle, and have labored, not only to promote the salvation of their fellow men, but to promote their happiness as far as possible in the world, by relieving want and suffering, administering consolation to the afflicted, and justifying the conclusion, that the God they served was a God of love, and that Christianity was a system of love and good will to men. Every spirit begetting its likeness, primitive Christianity was prolific to an admirable extent; and so it ever has been and must be, in whatever field it is exhibited. So hatred, cruelty, persecution, and injustice, have ever had the effect to increase opposition and hatred.

We sometimes express our astonishment, that the Jews, to such an extent, have remained opposers of Christianity; but that astonishment should cease, when we recollect that from their earliest history paganism has been at war with them and their religion, and that for the greater part of eighteen centuries, Christianity, so called, has been a refined system of paganism, both in its worship and spirit. Hatred to Jews has been a cardinal principle of some professed Christians. Cruelty, persecution, and oppression, in untold variety of ways, and unparalleled extent of time and universality of operation, have fixed them in their disgust of a religion so demoniac, so opposed to God and Heaven. In the Roman Catholic Church, Berk says' "they were peculiar objects of hatred during the ceremonies of Easter week. The misguided multitude thought they were doing a service to the Redeemer, whose sufferings they commemorated, by persecuting the descendants of those who had nailed him to the cross. Thus at Baziers, every year, on Palm Sunday, the Bishop mounted the pulpit of the cathedral, and addressed the people to the following effect: 'You have among you, my brethren, the descendants of the impious wretches who crucified the Lord Jesus Christ, whose passion we commemorate; show yourselves animated by the spirit of your ancestors; arm yourselves with stones, assail the Jews with them, and thus, as far as in you lies, revenge the sufferings of that Saviour who redeemed you by his own blood.'" Under such circumstances, who could expect Jews to be converted to Christianity? Until about fifty years ago, it was not generally admitted, in Europe, that Jews had any rights in Christian nations.

But Jews, like other people, are affected by kindness. When Christianity assumed something of its genuine spirit, and they found that they were cared for, they immediately became softened in their opposition, and occasional conversions occurred; and now, under a more genial influence, when Christians begin to feel, to labor, and pray for their salvation, and recognize their rights, and regard them as brethren, and heirs of the same glorious hopes, what is the effect? Missionaries in the East speak of hundreds of Jews who open their houses for instruction. One writer says, "In Hungary, and in Prussia, interest is still more general and intense. At Comitz, Posen, and Zempal, the Jews hear the missionaries gladly." "In Berlin, the progress of Christianity among the ancient people of God is extraordinary, and the opposition of the Rabbis cannot stop it. The Jews join by dozens and scores, and I hope they will soon come by hundreds. There are in the single city of Berlin one thousand Christian Jews—one hundred baptized in a single year." Within a few years, three hundred have been converted in London, near two thousand in Prussia, five hundred in Silesia, three hundred and sixty in Warsaw and vicinity. There is no considerable town in Germany where there are not found baptized Jews. In Germany and Prussia thousands of Jewish children attend Christian schools, and are instructed in Christianity. "The present state of the Jewish mind," says another writer, "is favorable to missionary labor. The field is ripe. In Cracow it is said that if support for proselytes could be obtained, one half of the Jews would become proselytes."

Of the prevailing disposition of the Jews to examine the claims of Christianity, much more might be added, even in the midst of corrupted Christianity; and what may we not hope when the Gospel in its purity is presented to them, with its labors of love to relieve their sufferings, bind up their wounds, and pour the oil of consolation into their lacerated bosoms, instructing them in the ways and means of industry and arts, to supply their wants, and point them to the Christian's home in heaven. Protestants, as well as Catholics, in their efforts to make converts, seek to separate them from their nationality, and all its high hopes and expectations, and yet they partially succeed. But could those observing the true Sabbath, and respecting their national rites, present them the pure Gospel, what might we not expect?—especially should we accompany our spiritual instructions with the arts of civilized life, and enlightened systems of requiting labor, and furnish to some extent the means of support, by industry, to the poor inquirer after truth. This is the logic of Heaven, and will convince and convert, when the catechizing and theorizing systems, without it, will find but little favor, and less success. What a suggestion is presented in the efforts to redeem the soil of Palestine, and fertilize its field, by increasing agricultural knowledge, and causing the land to sustain its inhabitants, and give employment to the thousands who are famishing in a land which once flowed with "milk and honey," and again must and will sustain and gladden its thousands of laboring poor? We might improve on this suggestion, and make ourselves welcome to the land, by the inhabitants of every caste and grade.

The Jews, it is true, are not pagan, but they are rebels to their King, and aliens to his government, not only in common with others, but peculiarly so in rejecting their Messiah; and the inconsistency of professing Christianity, has extended and protracted their alienation; and justice demands that we remove the stumbling-blocks out of the way of God's ancient people, so that his blessing may be received and appreciated, God glorified, the church enlarged and comforted, and the world saved. The great and leading argument must be, "For God so loved the world." This is the premise—and this the conclusion. It may appear illogical to the schools, but the conclusion is irresistible—foolish to the world, but it is the power of God, and the wisdom of God.

AMUSEMENTS.

A few weeks since, I noticed in the Recorder an article on "Popular Amusements," by a "Pastor." In that article he confined his remarks to dancing. I have no particular objections to what he wrote, but I think he did not write enough. We often hear, from the young and middle aged, "We must have amusements." I do not much wonder at this, when it comes from those who know nothing of experimental religion. But I have wondered at it, when I have heard it from professing Christians. Why do such need and want amusement? The impenitent sinner wants it, because he has nothing good and satisfying, upon which he can rest, and from which he can draw comfort. But why does the professed Christian say, "I must have amusement," and then run into all the foolish, nonsensical, and absurd recreations of sinners? Is it because religion does not furnish what he needs for his happiness? It certainly can not be this, for every real Christian finds in the enjoyment of Christ perfect peace, so that, as it is sometimes said, he "rejoices with a joy unspeakable and full of glory." His heart exults in its hope of salvation hereafter. He loves God; he loves the communion of Saints; he loves the worship of God; every feature of religion is lovely; all its doctrines, its sentiments, are lovely; and a contemplation of these always fills his soul with rich enjoyments. Why, then, does the Christian say, "I must have amusement?" Can he turn from his communion with God, and enjoy scenes of carnal pleasure? Are the gayeties of the pleasure-seeking crowd, above the joy the soul has in its communion with God? Or is it necessary to turn from these high and holy enjoyments to the sensual pleasures of this world, in order to give sufficient recreation to the mind? I cannot understand why the christian says, "I must have amusement."

I was once young, and witnessed the enjoyments of youth, their pleasures and amusements; and then I could not see what there was in the dance, or play, or chit-chat, that could give better happiness to the soul than religion gave. And since age with its experience has settled me into the realities of life, and brought its responsibilities and cares, I am still more at a loss to know why the Christian wants amusement. The gay, the coquetting time of life is short. The period of youth passes away in great haste. It hurries some into the busy cares of life, and others into the grave. And I remember that the wise man said, "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart and the sight of thine eyes, but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." Now, when the Christian knows all this, it seems wondrous strange that he will run into the foolish amusements of the world. I have wondered that the young Christians could run away from the afternoon meeting on the Sabbath, and congregate for a walk or a season of social chat, not the most instructive or religious. I have wondered that they could love any thing more than religion, or take pleasure in acting against Him who is altogether lovely, and the chief among ten thousands. It frequently happens, that amusements are purchased at too great a cost—the cost of religious enjoyment and religious reputation. When this is the case, they cost too much.

The influence that the professor of religion exerts upon the unregenerate, when he mingles in the crowd in search of pleasure, is very unhappy. I have wondered how the church members could do it, and how he could take pleasure in those gay, and sometimes foolish scenes, that draw the attention from the great interests of the soul. His conduct on such occasions is very inconsistent with his profession; and it misleads the impenitent with whom he associates. I am afraid that many precious youth will be lost forever because church members "must have amusement." I have witnessed several instances, when the Holy Ghost seemed to be driven off, and brightening prospects of the conversion of souls were all destroyed, apparently, from the course pursued by professors of religion. I have wondered that they could do so, and be the means of leading into sin those who were being called out of it, by the Holy Ghost. I have known ministers, whose souls seemed filled with the greatest anxiety, to have their hopes crushed, and their efforts paralyzed by members of the church, because they were lovers of pleasure more than of God. I have pitied them, when I have witnessed their sinking hopes, and failing energies, and knew that it was because members of their own churches were the cause of it all. It seems to me that the lover if amusement would abandon his amusements when he sees that they dispirit his minister, and mislead the impenitent. What are amusements worth, when they are enjoyed at so great a cost? Jesus Christ asked a very important question, when he said, "What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" The lover of amusement is invited to consider this question. If his amusements are inconsistent with the enjoyment of religion, and unfit him for its practices, he is in danger of losing his own soul on account of them. It is a dangerous condition. Let me ask such, what shall it profit them, if they succeed in their amusements, and destroy the souls of their companions in amusement? When there is so much interest connected with this matter, and the consequences are so far reaching, and the effects many times so disastrous, I wonder that church members will still say, "I must have amusement," and seek it at every cost.

THE ANGLO-BIBLICAL INSTITUTE.

An institution bearing this title was recently organized in London, of which John Lee, Esq., LL. D., F. R. S., F. R. A. S., is Treasurer; Rev. Joseph Turnbull, A. B., Secretary; and Rev. W. H. Black, Librarian. The object of the institution is one of general interest, as will be seen from the following Address, Plan, and abstract of Transactions at one meeting, which have been kindly furnished us by our friend Mr. Black.

Address.

The present advanced state of Biblical knowledge, and the increasing tendency of Biblical Literature to meet the requirements of the age, have suggested to some students of the Sacred Scriptures the propriety of instituting a Society for the promotion of Biblical Criticism; having more especially in view a superior Translation of the Bible into the English Language.

It is not to be understood that the Society will give any pledge for the production of such a work; but it will distinctly aim at promoting it.

That this important work, however, will, before long, be accomplished, there can be no reasonable doubt;—whether we consider the accumulation of critical apparatus, during the present century; or the urgent appeals of many pious and learned writers in favor of an improved version; or the numerous commentaries on the authorized version, originating in its mistakes and obsolete or improper expressions, quite apart from theological exposition; or the numerous Translations of the whole or of different portions of the sacred volume with notes, especially on the New Testament; or the different forms in which the present version is printed, with a view to obviate the unhappy effect of division by chapter and verse. All these are evident indications of a longing after the object which the Anglo-Biblical Institute will endeavor to attain.

The advantages of such an Institution will be immediately appreciated by learned persons engaged in the study of the Scriptures; and especially by those whose office requires them to be eminently qualified for Biblical interpretation.

There are, indeed, valuable periodical works, which serve as a means of communication among Biblical students: but such a medium is imperfect, in comparison with the proposed Institution; for, as "iron sharpeneth iron, so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend;" and immediate personal communication, by meetings or correspondence, will not only be more satisfactory, but will tend to bring the common object to a more speedy completion. How many lights will be collected—how many invaluable friendships formed—how many precious hours saved—how many prejudices removed—how much real knowledge and important truth will be acquired, by such an Institution! Even should it not, of itself, produce one entire and faultless work, it will, more than anything else, tend to its production.

And, should it eventually fall short of its great aim, yet, if the result shall be a far better English translation of the Bible than ever appeared before, what a boon will that be to the millions of the Anglo-Saxon race in the two hemispheres—not to insist on the collateral benefit to be deprived from such a work to the readers of Scripture in other tongues! What blessings will be pronounced on the memory of an Institution, which shall have only initiated such a work of true benevolence!

Under these impressions, the founders of The Anglo-Biblical Institute respectfully invite the attention of Biblical scholars to the object; and they are hopeful that many such will promptly be associated in the advancement of a work worthy of the noblest efforts.

Plan.

1. The object of The Anglo-Biblical Institute is—The promotion of Biblical Criticism, having more especially in view a superior translation of the Holy Scriptures into the English Language.

2. The Members, ordinary and honorary, will be learned persons, of either sex, interested in the object of the Institute.

3. To meet the expenses of the Institute, each ordinary Member shall pay ten shillings per annum, in advance.

4. The affairs of the Institute shall be conducted by a Council, a President, two or more Home Secretaries, a Foreign Secretary, a Treasurer, an Auditor and a Librarian.

5. There shall be Monthly Meetings of the Members; papers read on different subjects; specimens of English translation of the Scripture presented for critical discussion; correspondence maintained, not only with the distant Members, but with kindred institutions, and with eminent Biblical scholars in various parts of the world; and Transactions of the Institution printed for general circulation.

6. There shall be formed a standing Biblical Library, and principally of works relating to the leading object of the Institute. The Library to be situated in a central part of the metropolis, and open daily for the use of the Members.

Transactions.

At the monthly meeting of the members on Monday, 28th of February, 1853, a specimen translation of the 2d chapter of the Gospel by Matthew, with critical observations on some other portions of the New Testament, was read by the Rev. Dr. Richard Wilson, and his version was thought to be close and vernacular; several other versions of the same passage were referred to for comparison.

Mr. Black, of the Rolls House [and of Mill Yard] gave (by request) a verbal account of the ages of the oldest known Hebrew MSS. of the Holy Scripture. The learned member considered that the small number of very ancient Hebrew MSS. known, is to be attributed to two causes. First—The confusion arising from the persecution and unsettled state of the Jews for so many ages; and, secondly, that it has been the custom among the Jews to bury in the earth their old and worn-out scrolls of the synagogue. The age of Hebrew MSS. is also rendered uncertain from the want of dates—the rules of the Synagogue not permitting them to be inserted in the MSS. there deposited and used. From these and other circumstances, there can only be an approximation to the date of any ancient Hebrew MS. Were the celebrated Codex Hillel now extant, some more exact evidence might be obtained of the true marks of antiquity. Benjamin of Tudela, in the twelfth century, visited the supposed tomb of the prophet Ezekiel, on the Euphrates, near Bagdad, and was shown a MS. of the law in large character, which tradition related was the very autograph of that prophet. In the synagogue adjoining the tomb there was a considerable library of ancient Hebrew MSS., many of them alledged to be of the age of the first and second temples. De Rossi made use of a MS. of the Pentateuch, which he considered to be of the eighth or ninth century. Kennicott had two or three of the eleventh, or, perhaps, of the tenth century, and a few of the twelfth; but the generality cannot be of higher antiquity than the fourteenth or the fifteenth century. In this point of view, the age of our oldest Greek MSS. of the Scripture appears to have an advantage.

Mr. Black proceeded to state, on the authority of the learned Mr. Edelmann, who has investigated the Hebrew MSS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and in all parts of Europe, that there is at Odessa a MS. of the Pentateuch and the historical books, of the eleventh or twelfth century; another at Konigsberg of the twelfth or thirteenth; one in the Bodleian, of the Bible, of the thirteenth; and at Gallicia one of the Pentateuch, Megilloth, Job, &c., of the thirteenth century.

Mr. Black brought from his own considerable collection of Hebrew MSS. a copy of the Books of Job and Lamentations, in vellum, 4to., having the date of 1309; also a very curious one of the Pentateuch, in vellum, 8vo., of the thirteenth century, and written in the Rashi character, seldom used for copies of the Law; also a very beautifully written volume of the Megilloth, of the fifteenth century.

Mr. Black further produced a MS. of the paschal service, which contains the oldest known copy of the Hallel Psalms. He mentioned also that the synagogue at Worms is said to contain some exceedingly ancient MSS.

Mr. Turnbull stated that when at Mayence, in the year 1841, and visiting the synagogue there, the officiating rabbi informed him that they possessed manuscripts 500 years old; one of which he saw, and from its original beauty and worn state might be probably so ancient. He also produced a roll of the Book of Esther, beautifully written on vellum, and which was found in the house of a Greek, in a village in one of the islands of the Ægean Sea, in the year 1806, when the Turks attacked them, and the inhabitants fled to the mountains.

Dr. Lee, the chairman, also stated that he possessed some very beautiful ancient Hebrew rolls in his library at Hartwell, Bucks; and offered them for inspection to the members of the Institute.

Mr. Black considered that it is particularly desirable that we should obtain Hebrew MSS. from the East; the Malabar MS. at Cambridge, being, in this view, very valuable.

SUSPENSE.

When all is known, the darkest fate
The smitten heart may learn to bear,
And feel, when time cannot abate,
The settled calmness of despair;
But who can well endure the grief
Which knows no refuge or defense—
That age of pain, in moments brief—
The untold anguish of suspense?

When once the first rude shock is past,
The heart may still the storm outride,
As, from the wrecks around it cast,
It finds support to breast the tide;
But thus to linger day by day,
A prey to that foreboding sense,
Which gives a pang to each delay,
And agonizes with suspense;

To feel an ever present dread
Of some impending, nameless ill;
Is keener than the shaft when sped,
Which makes the wounded bosom thrill.
Then let me know the worst of fate,
Though it may rend with pangs intense,
For sure no pains were e'er so great
As are the tortures of suspense.

And yet the heart that trusts in God
Can find a balm for every woe,
For his own hand upholds the rod,
And mercy tempers every blow.
O, then, my soul, be strong in trust,
Whatever lot he may dispense,
Although the swelling heart may burst,
While agonizing in suspense. [Sidney Dyer.

AN AFFECTING INCIDENT.

During the researches of one of the philanthropic gentlemen engaged in the moral renovation of the Five Points, and other parts of the city in the same condition, a family of colored persons was found, occupying a most miserable and filthy tenement, in a state of great destitution and intemperate habits. In the center of the room was an old coalscuttle, elevated upon a few loose bricks, and partially filled with burning coal. Through the bottom of it was a hole which supplied the draft. Upon scanning the dusky group, one of the number, a girl about five years old, was noticed as having straight hair, and a more close examination revealed blue eyes, and a skin naturally white and clear. Inquiry was made as to the girl's parentage, &c., &c., when it was learned that her father was dead, and the mother was an inmate of the Blackwell's Island Hospital, suffering from a loathsome disease—the result of a profligate life.

After some persuasion, the colored people were induced to part with the child, and she was taken to Mr. Pease's mission rooms, washed and clothed. Thus metamorphosed, she appeared as a girl of rare beauty, adorned with graceful ringlets, and possessing an intelligent countenance. The missionary who found her, finally adopted her as his own. The additional fact was disclosed, that she had a sister living somewhere within the moral wilderness where this child was found. Diligent search was instituted, but so much falsehood and deception was used by the vile persons among whom she was concealed, that the search was near being abandoned. Finally, however, she was found in a house of bad repute in Wooster street, kept by colored persons. This sister was not inferior to the other in intelligence or personal beauty. Her age was three years, and her name was Tunny. She was found about three months ago. The first mentioned was named Ella. She was soon adopted by one of our most distinguished musical composers and vocalists.

The names of both are now changed. About a week ago, the time was appointed to restore these sisters to each other; for they had long been separated. The meeting was arranged to take place at Rev. Mr. Pease's, in Little Water-street (Five Points.) About forty ladies assembled. The little ones met in one of the apartments, and almost instantly recognized and embraced each other, with ardent expressions of love and joy at the restoration. The scene is spoken of as having been very affecting. This is one of the many instances where good has been accomplished by self-denying laborers in the abandoned and corrupt parts of the city. These reclaimed ones now promise to be ornaments to society. It is known that their parents at one time held positions of respectability and honor among our citizens. [N. Y. Jour. of Com.

THE PHYSICIAN HEALED.

A clergyman took charge of a parish at Helmsley, in Yorkshire, England, and devoted himself sedulously to the duties of his office. No part of his parish was neglected, and, in the opinion of all who knew him, no ministerial duty was left unperformed. He preached with great frequency, held catechetical exercises and private conferences, and meetings at his house for the improvement of young men in knowledge and virtue. He even went so far as to form an association, who entered into an agreement that at a certain hour, on the striking of the church clock, they should retire, each to his closet, and be present in spirit together before God in the exercise of prayer.

One morning, as he was reading in the gospel of Luke, he came to this passage: "Woe unto you, when all men speak well of you; for so did their fathers of the false prophets." He felt that the words applied to him. All men spoke well of him. He was the object of general approbation. He had met with no opposition in his course.

His mind was greatly disturbed by the passage, but he endeavored to recover peace and tranquillity, by greater strictness in the performance of duty. He fasted more frequently, and strove to recommend himself to God by increased exertion to become holy. On one occasion, he signed in his church, upon the altar, in characters written in his blood, a solemn surrender of his life to the service of God. Still his peace of mind was not fully restored. He still appeared to be included under the tremendous denunciation.

At length, when reading in the public service of the church the following expression, "the unsearchable riches of Christ," it made a very deep impression upon his mind. "The unsearchable riches of Christ!" said he to himself; "I never found, and never knew that there were unsearchable riches in him." Further reflection convinced him that the Apostle's view and experience of the gospel was entirely different from his own. The Apostle must be right, and he must be wrong. At length he was led to deep conviction of sin. He was convinced that he had not only deceived himself, but others—that he was not only in danger of losing his own soul, but of causing the loss of many others.

After some time spent in sighing and sorrow, he was led to contemplate the passage in Hebrews which declares, "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin;" and that passage in John which declares, "The blood of Jesus Christ his son cleanseth us from all sin." The way of salvation through Christ was made plain to him, and he was enabled to rest his hope in the atoning blood of Christ, and was made a partaker of his righteousness and joy.

The change wrought in him was attended with great excitement. "I went up and down again, backwards and forwards, in my room," said he, "clapping my hands for joy, and crying out, I have found Him, I have found Him, I have found Him, whom my soul loveth. For a time I hardly knew whether I was in the body or out of the body."

On the next Sabbath, he told the people that he had deceived himself and misled them, and gave an account of his recent experience of divine things. He then unfolded the way of salvation by the blood of Christ, and earnestly exhorted them to secure a portion in it.

He now found that all men did not speak well of him; still, great success attended his labors. Not long after his conversion, he was called to preach before the Archbishop of York. Disdaining to take counsel of flesh and blood, he preached a plain gospel sermon, proclaiming truths which he knew were unpalatable to the great majority of the clergy present. After the service was ended, as he was in the street conversing with several farmers, the Archbishop came along. "Well, Conyers," said he, "you have given us a fine sermon."

"I am glad it meets the approbation of your grace," was the reply.

"Approbation! Approbation! If you go on preaching such stuff, you will drive all your parish mad. Were you to inculcate the morality of the gospel, it would do some good, much more than canting about the new birth."

Mr. C. was not moved from his purpose, but continued to preach Christ crucified to the end of his days. [N. Y. Evangelist.

GOOD FROM AN ADVERSE PROVIDENCE.

A few years since, a missionary in one of the Feejee Islands heard that the people of a neighboring town were embracing Christianity. The report seemed incredible, inasmuch as it was not known that any missionary or other Christian teacher had been among them. A messenger was dispatched to ascertain the facts. The report was fully confirmed. The secret of this remarkable event was this: A short time before, a canoe was wrecked off the place, and all on board perished, except one Christian lad, who swam ashore. According to the custom of the Feejeeans with reference to those who have been shipwrecked, the inhabitants of the place began to make preparations to cook and eat the boy. Just at the juncture, a pagan friend interposed, and rescued him. He now concluded to remain with them, and labor for their evangelization, and the immediate results we have already indicated. "Here," remarks the historian, "is the beginning of a Christian church, founded by a doomed but rescued Feejee boy, who was faithful to his Lord and Master; a true successor of apostolic men, who, in any age or place, have done what they could for Jesus Christ."

A HUNDRED YEARS HENCE!

It strikes me as the most impressive of all sentiments, that it will be all the same a hundred years hence! It is often uttered in the form of a proverb, and with the levity of a mind that is not aware of its importance. A hundred years after this! Good heavens! with what speed and with what certainty will those hundred years come to their termination! This day will draw to a close, and a number of days make up one revolution of the seasons. Year follows year, and a number of years make up a century. These little intervals of time accumulate and fill up that mighty space which appears to the fancy so big and so immeasurable. The hundred years will come, and they will see but the wreck of whole generations. Every living thing that now moves on the face of the earth will disappear from it. The infant that now hangs on his mother's bosom will only live in the remembrance of his grandchildren. The scene of life and of intelligence that is now before me, will be changed into the dark and loathsome forms of corruption. The people who now hear me, will cease to be spoken of; their memory will perish from the face of the country; their flesh will be devoured by worms; the dark and creeping things that live in the holes of the earth will feed upon their bodies; their coffins will have mouldered away, and their bones be thrown up in the new made grave. And is this the consummation of all things? Is this the final end and issue of man? Is this the upshot of his busy history? Is there nothing beyond time and the grave to alleviate the gloomy picture, to chase away these dismal images? Must we sleep forever in the dust, and bid an eternal adieu to the light of heaven? [Dr. Chalmers.

"I Thought."—Would that more able men would think to as good purpose!

I thought, as I was busy with my hands, and blessed of God in my work, I would like to have some body speaking for God in my behalf, and that thought gave employment for the one hundred dollars I had laid by. I told my brother of it, and he said he would add fifty to that sum, and then we concluded that so long as it should please our Heavenly Father to intrust us with the means, we would continue the appropriation annually, for the support of a colporteur.

PALESTINE AGRICULTURAL SCHOOL.

Within a year or two past, considerable interest has been manifested, in various quarters, in regard to what has been termed the Palestine Agricultural School—an enterprise which was first conceived and undertaken by a Mr. Meshullam, a Jewish convert to Christianity. Several of the religious presses have given it a somewhat favorable notice; and in the Recorder, as our readers will remember, communications have appeared, which have served to excite not a little interest with some of our own people. Mr. Meshullam, we believe, was first brought into notice, on this side of the Atlantic, by means of a narrative set forth by a Mrs. Minor, of Philadelphia, who had visited Palestine, and become interested in his operations. At all events, this was our source of information, as, before reading her narrative, we had never heard of the man.

We suppose our readers are also pretty generally aware, that Mrs. Minor some time ago returned to Palestine, with the view of coöperating with Meshullam in his work of benevolence, and that several others of kindred spirit accompanied her. It now appears, that the copartnership into which she and Meshullam entered has been broken, and that an unpleasant difficulty has sprung up between them. Mr. Meshullam can no longer countenance Mrs. M., and Mrs. M. can hold no farther fellowship with Meshullam. What is to be the result of this trouble, we know not, nor do we know that it is any particular concern of ours. We do not allude to it with any design of siding with either of the conflicting parties, or of stirring up the feelings of our readers in reference to the matter: for aught we know, one may be as much in fault as the other.

But as there is a somewhat prevalent desire to know what are the present condition and prospects of that enterprise; and as the movements of Mrs. Minor and her coadjutors, in connection with the enterprise of Mr. Meshullam, have been viewed by some of our people as the leadings of a special providence inviting our denomination to take immediate steps towards the occupation of Palestine as a missionary field; and as a vague impression has gone abroad, that the Seventh-day Baptists of America are somehow concerned in the enterprise, and to a certain extent identified with it; we deem it due to the occasion to offer a passing word. We would therefore say, that neither Mrs. Minor nor Mr. Meshullam, nor any of their fellow-laborers, are ecclesiastically connected with us, nor has the denomination taken the said mission under its patronage in any form or manner whatever. Some benevolent individuals among us, it is true, have extended considerable aid in that direction, which they had an unqestioned right to do. But neither our Missionary Society, nor any Church, nor Association, nor organization of any kind, has taken up the matter with the view of giving it support. Thus much we think the public ought to know; and we trust this statement will be sufficient to relieve the denomination from all responsibility for any offenses against good order, of which either or both of the respective parties may, peradventure, have been guilty.

We do not know that any expression of opinion regarding Mrs. Minor, or Mr. Meshullam, is called for from us. Indeed, we have none that would be worth any thing to the public, if we were to express it. Our principal reason for alluding to the matter at all, is the fact that a few of our people have supposed that some sort of coöperation might be had with the parties concerned in the Agricultural School, which would be to our advantage denominationally, and have been a little impatient because action was delayed. Now, what we wish to say is simply this—that any alliance, for missionary purposes, with those who are not of us, is in our opinion very unadvisable, and ought not even to be thought of seriously. The fact that the parties alluded to claim to be observers of the Bible Sabbath, is not sufficient to warrant any such alliance. That their movements, and the facts which they reported, indicated a special providence calling us to move quickly, was never our opinion; and the recent misunderstanding of Mrs. M. with Meshullam, with its attending circumstances, as far as they have come to our knowledge, have but strengthened our impression that haste was not called for. This we say, not by way of taking credit to ourselves for superior discernment, as compared with those who thought otherwise. We say it simply for the sake of justifying ourselves from a suspicion, which has been sometimes not very obscurely hinted, that we were inimical to a mission in Palestine, because we did not fully sympathize with the excitement which seemed to grow out of Mrs. Minor's letters and publications.

Our views in reference to a mission to Palestine are what they have been from the beginning. We look upon such an enterprise as desirable. We have no objection to going into it, provided there be no attempt to amalgamate with other parties. Let us go into it independently, if at all. Meshullam may be doing a good work, for any thing we know to the contrary, but if we undertake an enterprise in Palestine, let us go about it as though Meshullam were not there, and never had been. We say the same in regard to Mrs. Minor. If we can send one or more missionaries to that country, who will conduct the enterprise in a gospel manner, and simply mind their own business, we shall give our hearty support. Nay, more; we hope that God, in his providence, will soon give us the missionaries to send, though, at present, we have no idea who they will be, or from what quarter they will spring. Of the ability of our denomination to sustain such an enterprise, under God's blessing, we entertain no doubt; and we trust that, when the time comes for action, it will be found that they are willing.

It is proper to add, that the Missionary Board has had, and still has, the subject under consideration. In the discussions which have taken place, allusions have been made to the enterprise of Meshullam & Co., as there have also to the movements of the English Church, the Disciples, and others; but the question of forming an alliance with him and his colaborers, or of taking their enterprise under our patronage, if it has been privately entertained by individuals, has not been entertained by the Board. We know of no reason for supposing that it ever will be.

Our remarks, we trust, will not be considered as having been prompted by any unfriendly spirit towards Mrs. Minor and her companions in labor, or towards Meshullam. We wish them both success, as far as they are conforming to the will of God. All we design is, to enter our caveat against alliances or copartnerships of any kind with those who do not symbolize with us fully in faith and practice. In the religious world, such things seldom or never work well. T. B. B.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday "Desecration"—Sunday Liquor Drinking—Mrs. Stowe—The Madiai—Robert Owen.

GLASGOW, April 15th, 1853.

Two days ago, the House of Commons being in Committee for consideration of the County Elections Bill for Scotland, Mr. Hume moved that the words prohibiting polls being held on Monday be omitted. He and the House were thereupon reminded, by Mr. Dunlop and Mr. Lockhart, that if Monday were allowed to be a polling day, it would lead to Sunday desecration; and also, that as several of the Railways in Scotland ran no Sunday trains, persons from a distance might be prevented from arriving in time to vote. Mr. Hume replied, that he was aware of the monomania of some persons in regard to Sunday trains, but that he did not see that in the framing of the law their consciences were to be made a rule for others. On the vote being taken, there was a majority for Mr. Hume's amendment of 71 against 60. Considering the evident reason for the original insertion of the clause, and the reasons adduced for retaining it, the alteration thus made may be regarded as expressive of the mind of the majority in respect to Sunday sanctification; and thus perhaps to foreshadow the nature of the decision in regard to the Sunday opening of the Crystal Palace, when that question comes to be decided. Meanwhile the Church, through Sunday Observance Committees, Synods, Presbyteries, and Sessions, is getting presented numerous petitions to prevent the dreaded result. On the opposite side, also, although with less advantage of organization, not a few are being sent in. One day this week, a considerable number, from working men of different trades, were presented by different members of the House of Commons. Among those thus praying for the Sunday opening, we may note that at Sydenham itself, the scene where the Palace is being erected, a large meeting was last week held, which passed resolutions favorable to that object.

A controversy has for some time been maintained, by a portion of the newspaper press, as to the comparative intemperance of Glasgow, Edinburgh, and other towns—the discussion having originated with a parliamentary paper giving police returns bearing on the subject. These returns present indeed a sad picture. But a considerably darker shade has been given to that picture by an exhibition of the Sunday drinking in the city of Edinburgh. Two hundred persons, under the direction of the Total Abstinence Society, had, for a number of Sundays, been watching the public houses of Edinburgh, and the result for the 6th ult. has been published. There are, according to the statement, 975 licensed houses in the city and suburbs; and of these 312 were opened on the Sunday referred to. On 268 of these houses, (omitting those in the suburbs, as not easily to have been overtaken at the time) watches were set; who report that between the hours of 1 and 2 in the afternoon, and from 4 o'clock the rest of the day and evening, 22,202 men, 11,931 women, and 7,663 children, making a total of 41,794 persons, entered these houses. The Committee even state that the return is rather under than over the average of Sunday drinking; and they specially remark on the awful evil of so many children being thus disciplined into the use and love of intoxicating drink, through their being employed by their parents in conveying it to them from the public house, and thus eventually being made pests to society. The object sought by those who have been at such pains to detect and expose the enormous evil (presenting, as it does, a rather remarkable part of the testimony of universal Sunday observance, before which the commandment of the Lord is to be rejected,) is to lend aid to Mr. F. Mackenzie's Public House Bill, now before the House of Commons. That Bill has a clause specially in reference to Sunday, and, on that account, avowedly, it is receiving greater support, by petitions in its favor, than it would have done merely on account of the intemperance which its author seeks to suppress.

Mrs. Stowe and friends arrived safely in town two nights ago, and although still indisposed, and easily fatigued, Mrs. S. is expected to be present at the soiree got up in her honor. That soiree will be a profanation of the Sabbath evening; but Mrs. S., it is to be presumed, is better acquainted with the horrors of slavery than with the command to Remember the Sabbath—with the day of which that commandment speaks, I mean—and the sin of making it void in order to keep a church tradition.

The Madiai are at present residing with Sir Culling Eardley in the south of France. Rest and quiet they much need, to restore them, if the will of God be so, from the effects of the persecution they have endured. Their best friends are indeed anxious to protect them from the dangers, of a different nature, to which they would next be exposed, by being brought prominently forward on the platforms, at meetings promoted to tell of their personal wrongs and personal faith. They have had no training to fit them to be useful on a wide arena; and scope enough will be afforded in more private walks to live and manifest a life of faith.

Robert Owen, once of Lanark Mills here, and afterwards of New Harmony, I think, in the United States, and who has been nearly all his life dreaming and talking of regenerating the world by a scheme of his own, without reference to God, has been seduced by the flattery of the lying rapping spirits in London. For the last six months, there has been an American medium in our capital, who, although charging a guinea from each visitor, has been largely patronized, and Owen is of the number of the deluded. He has issued a kind of manifesto, (old work of his,) "to all governments and people," announcing that, through means of these spirits, a great moral revolution "is about to take place," in accordance with his former long-cherished theory. He avows that, till within the last few weeks, although "he believed all things to be eternal," he "was of opinion that there was no personal or conscious existence after death;" he has, however, he declares, received communications "purporting to be from departed spirits,"—those of "President Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, the late Duke of Kent," &c.,—intimating that "this miserable state of human existence" is about to be rectified by the universal application of his own social system. Miserable man, who rejects the true revelations of God, and is yet so easily taken with what pleases his own imagination, purporting, falsely, to be from departed spirits!

MISSION OF YOUTHFUL SABBATH-KEEPERS—NO. 4.

If, as we have attempted to show, the trials connected with being a Sabbath-keeper are great, and the temptations incident to our position many, we have a journey before us that is arduous and full of snares; yet what are these things to sincere lovers of truth? They cannot injure us, save as we give way to them. Instead of this, these very difficulties and temptations are most efficient means of strength and advancement, if we but battle with them as we ought. As physical labor and struggle give physical strength and aptness—as mental labor and effort give mental power—so these attendants of our position will, if rightly met, give spiritual power and grandeur. The course of truth is always rugged and steep, and those laboring for its advancement must expect to meet with trial and opposition. The history of the world shows that the progress of such has ever been marked with opposition and persecution, fire and blood. The Prophets and Apostles, and all the early Christians, found their pathway a pathway of thorns and death. Their faith, their love of truth, led into dungeons and dens—to scaffolds and flames. Those Christian reformers who arose amid the corruptions of a degenerate Church, had to do much hard fighting, and endure much suffering. Christ, the centre and source of all truth, experienced the fate of a common malefactor. And well may we be thankful that we live in times of comparative peace and safety, when the practical adoption of truth, in opposition to the world, brings with it only its legitimate inconveniences, with a share of unavailing prejudice, and just enough of arbitrary law to remind us of those sterner times that tried men's souls. We ought to be thankful if it is granted to us to bear some humble part in the great battle of truth against error.

But it may be asked, What prospect, what hope, have we? Is not every thing against us? We are but few and weak, while those opposed to us are many and giants. Many noble hearts are willing and anxious to work, if there be any chance for doing good, any prospect of success; but if they are to move the world, they would like, with the old Greek philosopher, to have somewhere to stand while they do it.

It is replied, that we have a place broad and firm on which to take our stand. It is no less than the eternal law of God, which never fails those reposing upon it. It is true that those against us are many and powerful; but if we labor for Deity and his law, He will be for us. Thus assisted, what have we to fear? Though success is no measure of duty, yet God, by his Word, his Spirit, and his providences, is ever working for truth. Though error may shroud the land with its death-like pall, or stalk forth with its hydra-heads, yet

> "Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again:
> The eternal years of God are hers."

Doubtless, the struggle we shall have to endure, if we are faithful to the trust committed to us, will be long and arduous. There never was any great and radical reform brought about, without long and severe labor. But every step gained in the toilsome ascent, makes the succeeding one easier. Every new truth learned and adopted by man, paves the way for other truths; every error overcome, gives strength for overcoming other and greater errors.

Those errors, which it is our especial province, as Sabbath keepers, to oppose, are gradually giving way—are dying amid their worshipers. Sunday observance is losing much of the former sacredness thrown around it by the rigors of a Puritanic faith. Its palmiest days are past—its meridian glory is fading. Ichabod hath been written in characters of flame upon its forehead by the finger of God. Though its death-struggle may be long and severe—though its decrepitude may be bolstered and propped up by State enactments and sectarian zeal, yet its final doom is the same as of all error. As surely as there is a God in heaven, directing the affairs of the universe, truth will ultimately prevail—the law of the Lord will be the supreme and only rule of action for man. Blessed are those who shall be found in the end to have been fighting for the law of God. Though few and feeble in worldly power, yet we are permitted to be the harbingers and defenders of the true light—permitted to be co-workers with God in carrying forward his great plans of truth and right. Though there is being separated from us much of chaff and dross—many that are attracted by the glitter of gold, and honor, and station—many that prefer prosperity to the "Higher Law," as well as, perhaps, now and then, one of elevated and sincere purposes; yet, God is giving unto us, in their stead, many noble spirits, whose sincere love of truth, and ardent desire for a closer walk with God, according to his commandments, lead them to follow wherever conscience may point the way, regardless of the weight of the cross to be borne. We are, however, but the harbingers of a brighter day—the heralds of mighty forces; for, if Christendom read aright the promises of God, we are not left to fight the battle alone. He has a reserved host, to be marshaled in due time as the body guards of truth, or to fight in the front ranks of the battle of truth against error.

There is a people, scattered and peeled, driven from the home of their fathers—a people ever looking wistfully to the land of promise, as they walk mournfully up and down the earth, and praying for the hastening of the appointed time, when they may return again in peace to Jerusalem, and go up to Mount Zion for worship. If we read aright the declarations of God concerning them, they are yet to be gathered into the fold of Christ. They are to unfurl the gospel banner—

> "O'er Bethlehem's plains, and the land that was trod
> By the feet of the prophets, and people of God."

From Mount Olivet and Calvary shall go up songs of redemption—from the walls of Jerusalem, the sons of Israel shall proclaim a glad jubilee to nations of the earth. Instead of being opposers of Christianity, the Jews are to become its chief heralds, and all people shall gladly flock to their standard. We may believe that they will, in their conversion, adopt the pure, unadulterated truths of the Bible. Their firm adherence to the Mosaic law is a sure guarantee that they will never forsake the law of God for the commandments of men. Yielding implicit obedience to the whole Decalogue, as they doubtless will, they will become mighty instruments in bringing the world to the same obedience. It is, doubtless, through their conversion and agency, that the contending elements of Christian denominations are to be harmonized and united—the whole church of Christ becoming as one body, fitly put together, and acting in unison throughout all its parts. Coming up, as they will, from every quarter of the globe where man has found an abiding place, not only speaking all languages and dialects, but also being acquainted with the manners, beliefs, prejudices, and practices of humanity, in all its varied forms of degradation or advancement, the Jews will make most available, efficient, and successful missionaries. When they shall thus begin to run to and fro as heralds of truth and righteousness, the knowledge of the Lord will be rapidly increased, until it shall cover the whole earth. Their preservation, conversion, and restoration to the land of promise, will be such an attestation of the truthfulness of Revelation, that the nations of the earth will become ready, eager listeners to their teachings. Then, and not till then, may we look for the triumph of Bible truths. Then may we expect the power that hath changed times and seasons to be dethroned, and the law of God restored to its rightful supremacy. The law, the whole law, unmodified, will become a delight. The Sabbath, blessed of God when "time was young," will then re-assume its true position in the affections and observances of men—upheld, not by Councils, Synods, or Conventions, but by its own divine origin and sanction.

If such is the course and destiny of the Sabbath, there opens before us a field of labor sufficiently broad and commanding to enlist all of our powers—sufficiently bright and promising, in its ultimate results, to satisfy our most ardent desires. Though, at present, we may find ourselves weak and opposed, our numbers few, our pecuniary, literary, and civil sacrifices many, yet we are to labor on, not only with the satisfaction arising from doing our duty, but also with the assurance that we are laboring in the direct line of the march of truth. There is sufficient pleasure in the simple consciousness of doing right to satisfy the mind of man. The rewards of virtue reverting upon the agent, amply repay all toil and privation. How much greater, then, are the inducements, when, in advance, we see success the most cheering, fruits most abundant, crowning our efforts. The true Christian spirit leads its possessor to cheerful labor and sacrifice for the cause of God, uncaring consequences; but such cheerfulness is increased to the highest joy, when the assurance is given, that our efforts are preparing the way for the chariots of salvation to roll over the earth, bearing the conquering hosts of the Lord. Truthful and earnest spirits must ever expect opposition and sacrifice; but on counting the cost, the rewards are always found to far exceed the sacrifices. It is a glorious mission, to be commissioned of Heaven to fight for any truth—much more, for a truth, that we have the fullest assurance, if prophecy fail not, will, one day, be acknowledged and observed of all men.

Such are some of the characteristics, difficulties, and prospects of our more especial mission as Sabbath-keepers.

MACOM.

"KEY TO UNCLE TOM'S CABIN."

Like "all the world, and the rest of mankind," I have been impatient to obtain and read the above-named work. I have obtained and read it, and, like most of those who read, have passed judgment upon it. "Truth is stranger than fiction." Mrs. Stowe, in the Key, furnishes the facts on which the fiction was founded. In part first, she gives the counterpart to the history of the most important characters in her first work. It will be somewhat difficult for many who have read Uncle Tom's Cabin, in the glowing style in which it was written, to read with entire satisfaction this part of the work. Stubborn, every-day facts, many times fail to enlist the reader's mind. In this age of fancy and dreamy romance, when brains are made into mud-puddles, and imaginations are bewildered in following the leadings of fiction writers, it is difficult to deal in facts, and make them impressive. The Key will be called a failure by many such minds, but not by any others. The work is an embodiment of facts; and such facts as will make all feel, who read it, that the half has not been told them before. All efforts of the slave power, in church and state, can not remove the impressions that will be created in reading this work. It is here shown, that the curse of slavery is not only interwoven with one, but all the interests, civil, political, and ecclesiastical, in the country. The worst features of slavery, as described in the Cabin—its extremest suffering, its lowest degradation, its horrid cruelties, its darkest ignorance, and wildest superstitions, are more than proved to be every-day realities. If Mrs. Stowe showed herself an artist in the fiction, and thereby gained a world-wide fame, in the facts on which it was founded she has fully sustained her well-earned reputation. In both works she has faithfully given the least objectionable features of slavery. And the readers of the "Key" will be astonished that, from the multiplicity of facts, of every dark hue, there drawn out and embodied, she wrote so generously and kindly in the fiction. The Key will be read by thousands as a triumphant vindication of the Cabin. It is a book of Facts, giving almost every feature of slavery and its workings. We ask for it a general, a thorough, and patient reading. J. B.

SECOND-ADVENT SABBATARIANS.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Perhaps it is not generally known throughout our denomination, that within a few years quite a large number of that class of Christians called Second Adventists have become Sabbath-keepers, and are organized into Sabbath-keeping churches or congregations, and regularly maintain the public worship of God on his holy day. At the present time they number probably between six and seven thousand, scattered over most of the United States and Canada. Their zeal in the cause of the Sabbath has been worthy of our imitation; while their self-denial and suffering reproach for the truth, is proof of the sincerity of their faith. They number in their ranks men of talent and erudition, capable of measuring arms with any of the advocates of first-day observance. They are engaged in publishing periodicals and tracts, advocating the claims of the Sabbath of the Lord. The ground taken by them on this subject is something in advance of even our denomination. Many of them considered the truth of the Sabbath of such importance that they were re-baptized when they came into the observance of it. Some of their writings on the Sabbath question might be republished by our Sabbath Tract Society, perhaps, to advantage, and especially a review of one Crozier by a Mr. Andrews. That review covers the whole ground of the no-Sabbath doctrine, and is worthy of an extensive circulation.

I intended to have introduced this subject at the Anniversary of the Tract Society last fall, and to see if their coöperation with us might not be secured. But as no convenient opportunity seemed to be offered then, nor since, I take this method of calling the attention of our people to the subject; and I beg leave to suggest, whether there might not be some movement on the part of our denomination toward them, that would open a door of usefulness to both parties. I have visited many of these people in Maine, Block Island, and other places, and from persanal observation, I think they are aiming at the whole truth of Christianity. They are noted for their devotional spirit, prayer, and faith in God. They discard all connection with the social and political sins of the day, and are advocates of the various moral reforms by the power of the gospel. The above, I think, will be found true on a more intimate acquaintance. Were I in circumstances to meet the expense, I would like to visit them, and ascertain more fully their position. S. S. GRISWOLD.

AWFUL CALAMITY LAST SABBATH.—On Sabbath (Saturday) morning, April 30, about two o'clock, the steamer Ocean Wave, on her way from Hamilton (Canada West) to Ogdensburg, took fire from her furnace. She was six miles west of the "Ducks," and fifty miles above Kingston. When the fire was first discovered, she was about a mile and a half from the shore, which she was immediately headed for, but so intense was the heat that the machinery gave out, and she drifted to sea. The upper cabin was consumed in about fifteen minutes, and in about two hours the hull went down. She had on board 14 cabin and 9 deck passengers, besides 4 children and the crew, who swelled the number to about 50, of whom 22 were saved. Among the crew saved were Capt. Wright and both mates; Thomas Oliver, the purser; both wheelmen, the second engineer, Mr. Blackman, and a number of deck hands. Among the passengers saved were Mr. Francis Kiah and wife, both of whom were burned, but not dangerously; Mrs. French, of Cornwall, and the wife of Mr. Moore, of the Gore Bank, Hamilton. These three were all the females that were saved. A small vessel on her way downward, sent a boat to the assistance of the ill-fated steamer, but the men being frightened, pulled away again. The schooner Georgiana then hove in sight, lowered a boat, which was manned by her mate and two sailors, and succeeded in picking up 18 persons. In two minutes after their rescue, the wreck went down. She had drifted eight miles from the shore before she sunk. The captain, first mate, and one passenger, reached the shore near the disaster, and the vessel brought the rest to Kingston. Among those lost are Mr. Turnbull, first engineer, Julius Sanders, barkeeper, the cook, a Mrs. Donald, a nurse and three children of the cashier of the Gore Bank, Hamilton; three ladies, names unknown; Mr. Lyman B. Fiske, of the firm of H. S. Humphrey, of Ogdensburgh; whole number lost at least 28. The progress of the flames was so rapid that it was impossible to launch any of the boats which were on board.

A FUGITIVE SLAVE MISSIONARY.—Rev. H. H. Garnet, formerly of Troy, a colored clergyman of extraordinary ability, being obliged to flee his native country on the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law, went to Scotland, and from thence has been sent by the United Presbyterians to Jamaica, as a missionary pastor at Stirling, Westmoreland. We find a letter from him in the Philadelphia Christian Recorder, an extract from which will gratify many:—

"I have a fine church in this place, and a large congregation; our members and elders are black and white. The country is most beautiful, and my dwelling-house is nicely situated. I have also a flourishing day and Sabbath school under my charge. I have nothing to complain of—God has greatly blessed me, and in a worldly point of view I have full and plenty. Oh, it would do your heart good to see our colored legislators, and justices, and lawyers, and ministers. I am connected with the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, a church which has no stain of slavery upon her."

RESULT OF A BOLD STROKE.—The Detroit (Mich.) Tribune tells the following good story—most too good to be true:—

In an adjoining town there are two so-called first-class hotels, where liquor has heretofore been sold. The proprietor of one of them, being addicted to the use of the ardent, was drunk a good portion of the time. One day last week, after his wife had put him comfortably to bed, while drunk, she went into the bar-room, and thence into the cellar, and emptied out all the grog in the house. The next morning, on arising, he naturally wended his way to the bar for a "hair of the dog that bit him," when he was informed by the barkeeper of what had taken place. "I'll be even with her," he exclaimed, and straightway went and signed the pledge "to taste not, touch not, and handle not." An effort was then made to induce the other landlord to discontinue the traffic. He said he would sell no more, if his neighbor would not, when he was shown the pledge which that neighbor had just signed. He immediately emptied his bar, and on last Monday evening both were initiated into the Temple of Honor of that place.

THE LAW OF RAILROADS.—In the course of an opinion recently delivered by Judge Warren, of the Cincinnati Probate Court, in a railroad case, he said:

In England all persons have free liberty to use the railway with carriages properly constructed, upon payment of the rates and tolls demanded by the company, and subject to the rules and regulations which they shall from time to time make under their act. The effect of such an enactment is to constitute the railway, in a point of law, a highway on which all the world may have a right to carry passengers. In this country no such a right has been generally recognized; it would be impracticable if it were. The mode of transportation, and the transportation itself, must then be under the entire control of the company.

"UNCLE TOM" BIBLES IN FRANCE.—A letter written from France, under date of April 2d, says:—

"Uncle Tom's Cabin is having as great a run in France as it seems to have had in England and America. Whatever be the opinion on slavery, it will be acknowledged that this work has done one good in France, viz: it has awakened a desire in many minds to read the Bible. Colporteurs have reported lately, that the question has been put to them, whether their Bibles were the same as Uncle Tom's; and when an affirmative answer has been made, the Bible has been bought at once."

HYMN AUTHORSHIP.—Since Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg's statement in regard to the origin of the hymn, which we recently printed, "I would not live alway," another man has set up a claim to the authorship of it. His name is Henry Ward, and he was formerly, if he is not now, a printer by trade. Two or three of our exchanges have taken the side of Mr. Ward, while others seem to side with Dr. Muhlenberg.

European News.

By the steamers Humboldt, Canada, and Baltic, we have ten days later news from Europe, the London dates being to April 20. A summary of the news, which is not important, will be found below.

Mrs. Stowe was welcomed at the landing at Liverpool on Sunday, by a large crowd assembled on the wharf, and proceeded to the house of a friend, Mr. Edward Cropper. On Monday morning she met a select circle at breakfast, when Dr. McNeil presented an address of welcome. On Tuesday she met the members of the Liverpool Negro's Society. On Wednesday she attended the British and Foreign Bible Society, and was presented with £130 by 2,200 subscribers. On the same day Mrs. Stowe left for Glasgow.

The British House of Commons has voted to abolish the duty on newspaper advertisements.

The British repulse at Donabew was more disastrous than at first reported; 100 were killed or missing.

Louis Napoleon had been sick, but had recovered.

The Paris Moniteur publishes a decree to increase the salaries of teachers in the public schools of France.

It is announced that the expedition against the pirates of the Bissagos Isles, on the west coast of Africa, had been completely successful, and that those ferocious marauders had been severely punished.

The subject of the reëstablishment of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy in Holland had been brought before the Dutch Chambers, when it was announced by the Ministry that not only had strong remonstrances been made to the Pope, but the Dutch Ambassador had been withdrawn from Rome.

A new manifesto from Mazzini is reported to have appeared at Turin. It is now said that Mazzini and some of his agents have crossed from Malta into Sicily. Eighty prisoners have been arrested at Catania and Messina.

A Berlin correspondent says that Fritze & Co., of Bremen, are about to compete with the Washington and Hermann steamers, by running monthly, between Bremen and New York, the steamships Hansa, of 3,000 tuns and 1,000 horse power, and the Germania, of 1,600 tuns and 600 horse power. Both vessels were recently purchased from the German fleet, and the cabin fare is to be about $90.

Loss of the Steamship Independence.

F. L. Sampson, late Captain of the ill-fated steamship Independence, has published a statement of facts connected with that sad affair. The following extract contains the substance of it:—

On the morning of Feb. 16th, at 1 o'clock A. M., made the main land to the eastward of the Island, having been set in-shore by the current. Altered the course to S. W. At 2 A. M. made the Island of Margarita, the south point bearing W. by S. per compass; then altered the course to W. S. W. I intended to give the point a berth of three miles, but owing to a haze over the land, I was deceived in the distance. At 5.15, just as day was beginning to break, she struck on a sunken reef, extending off from the south point of the Island about a mile from the shore. The sea was very smooth at the time, not breaking on the reef at all. Backed the engine, and she came off; examined the hold, and found that she was filling rapidly; knew that I should have to beach her to keep her from sinking; got a sail over the bow (under her) to try to stop the leak, and set a gang of men at work at each hatchway bailing, and ran along the west side of the Island, close in, to find a good place to put her ashore. Told the Engineer to let me know five minutes before the water would be up high enough to put out the fires. When we had run about four miles, the Engineer came up and reported the water nearly up to the fires, and that they would be extinguished in a few minutes. Put the helm hard a-port, and ran her ashore in a small cove on the S. W. side of the island, head on. Lowered a boat, and sent the mate and two men in her to run a line ashore to the beach, which was about one hundred yards distant, but the boat broached to and was swamped in the surf. Lowered another boat, and sent three men in her with another line, which they scceeded in getting ashore. I now ascertained that the ship was on fire. Told the Engineer to take his men and put out the fire if possible. Ordered the other two boats to be lowered and to come forward, and the women and children to come to the forward gangway; loaded both boats with women and children, and sent them ashore. The ship had now swung round broadside on. The mate and two men came off with the boat that took the line ashore, and she was immediately loaded with women and children and went ashore with them. The fire originated from the furnaces. It was necessary, after the steamer struck on the reef, to use wood and boards for fuel, in order to keep up steam until she struck on the beach, when the water was so high as to stop the draft from the lower flues, which forced open the furnace doors, and flames rushed out and caught the wood work in the fire-room, and also around the smoke-stack, thence spreading very rapidly. Every effort was made to get the fire under, but of no avail. The flames were now coming up from the hatchways, fire-room, engine-room, ventilators, and around the smoke-stack; every thing was consternation and dismay; the people seemed completely bewildered, and were jumping overboard by dozens. The scene was perfectly horrible and indescribable—men, women and children screeching, crying and drowning. I ordered the spars, hatches, tables, and every thing that would float, to be thrown overboard, which was done, and they were immediately covered with people. About an hour after the ship struck the beach, she was in a perfect sheet of flame, and there was no one on board of her except one of the coal-passers, named Beaumont, and myself. The smoke stack had fallen, and the promenade deck forward had tumbled in; the flames were coming out of the side-lights, and it was impossible to stay on board any longer. A boat came off from the shore with two of the deck-hands in her. Beaumont, who was near the fore rigging, jumped into her, and I jumped overboard, swam to her, and commenced picked up those who were afloat. After picking up three boat-loads, Thomas Herren, the steward, succeeded in launching another boat and saving some of the people. When all that were alive had been picked up, and some of the baggage, I landed and had the spars which had drifted ashore hauled up into a râvine, and with one old sail that had washed ashore, made a tent large enough to shelter the women and children. The ship was still in flames, so that it was impossible for any one to board her. I gave the Mate and Engineer orders to have the dead taken up above high water and buried, and to board the wreck as soon as possible and save all the provisions and water that they could. I then took a boat and four men and started to pull round the north end of the island to Magdalena Bay in search of assistance.

Railroad Accident.

A shocking railroad accident occurred at a crossing of the Michigan Central and Michigan Southern Railroads, ten miles from Chicago, on Monday evening, April 25th. An express train ran into an emigrant train, smashing several cars, killing about twenty persons, and wounding some fifty more. The Coroner's Jury, after investigation, attached the blame to both roads, and have held for trial the Conductors and Engineers on each train. We select, from the various accounts of the matter, the following incidents:—

The crossing is on a wide, level prairie. The Central train saw the other a mile and a half off, but supposed it would approach with caution, as they had the right of track going west. It slacked its own speed to four miles per hour, so as to control it, but its speed was then so slow, and the other train was rushing down upon it with such fearful velocity, that it was impossible to escape. The train was struck near the center, and as it happened, the two or three cars containing the passengers (emigrants) were in the center, to catch the blow. The locomotive ran clear through the train, reducing several cars in both to a mass of ruins.

The locomotive of the express train struck the sixth car, filled with passengers, and in a moment the locomotive, tender, baggage car, and one second class car of the express train, together with three emigrant cars of the Michigan Central train, were a heap of ruins.

On the northerly side of the Central track, one first class passenger car was thrown upon its side, and groans and cries assailed the ears of those who hastened from the rest of the first class cars which retained their position. Those in this car were aided to escape from the confusion, and from the danger of suffocation, and it was found that none were dangerously injured, though several received severe bruises.

The scene which presented itself upon the other side of the Central track cannot be fully described, and time will not efface the memory of that terrible and heart-rending spectacle, from the mind of the unwilling beholder.

We saw a heap of ruins, from beneath which shrieked out upon the midnight air, cries for help, mingled in strange discord with the deeper toned groans of the dying. One by one those who were able crawled out from the rubbish, while the uninjured were fully employed in rendering assistance to those unable to extricate themselves.

Each moment the scene became, if possible, more heart-rending. Here sat a poor woman with a broken limb, and her little daughter stood by her side, weeping and begging for assistance. There lay a young German, dead, his sister by his side, wringing her hands, and crying, "Mein bruder, mein bruder!" Here a child crying, "O, my father;" there a woman wailing for the loss of her infant. A woman dead, her mangled features but partially concealed by a cloak, and at her side only a faithful dog.

Three children, from three to ten years of age, were taken from the water, and placed side by side. At the head of one sat the bereaved father. No one came to claim the other two.

An infant was picked out of the ruins unharmed, but no mother could be found for it.

Those most dangerously injured were conveyed into the unharmed cars, and rendered as comfortable as possible. With some, the struggle between life and death seemed uncertain.

The Slave Trade.—We learn from a credible source, that three Portugese Captains, and one Catalan merchant, arrived from Cuba by the Cherokee and Black Warrior steamers, and are now in this city, making arrangements for despatching vessels to the Coast of Africa to engage in the Slave Trade between that Coast and Cuba. They have already contracted for three clippers, to be built at Baltimore, and are making other preparations in this city.

It is known that there are now in this city several mercantile houses extensively engaged in the slave trade, and that half a dozen vessels have already left this and other American ports, for the African Coast. These vessels clear for some Cuban port, where they never arrive; and being provided with false papers, and sailing under the American flag, they succeed in reaching the Coast, obtaining cargoes of slaves, and landing them in Cuba, with the connivance and complicity of the Spanish authorities. Britain's "Happy Family."—The Queen, Alexandrina Victoria, was born May 24, 1819.

Prince Francis Albert Augustus Charles Emanuel of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, was born Aug. 26, 1819.

The twain were married at the age of 21, on the 10th of Feb. 1840. The issue has been:

Victoria Adelaide Mary Louisa, born Nov. 21, 1840.

Albert Edward, born Nov. 9, 1841.

Alice Maud Mary, born April 25, 1843.

Alfred Ernest Albert, born Aug. 6, 1844.

Helena Augusta Victoria, born May 25, 1846.

Louisa Caroline Alberta, born March 18, 1848.

Arthur William Patrick Albert, born May 1, 1850.

A son not yet named, born April 7, 1853.

Eight children—four sons and four daughters—in thirteen years, and all alive and well.

Michigan State Normal School.—This is located at Ypsilanti—A. S. Welch, Principal. It organized on Tuesday, the 29th March, under the most favorable auspices. Over 500 teachers were present. The Professors of the Michigan University were present, and will deliver courses of lectures. Prof. Brainard and Mr. Freese were there. Prof. B. lectured several times. The sessions of the Normal school will continue four months. The building and fund of this school cost $25,000. Thirteen thousand dollars of this amount was subscribed by the citizens of that place. This School does great credit to the State. Michigan indeed is outstripping all of the States west in the way of furnishing education to the people. She has the only Agricultural and Normal Schools, both of which are tall feathers in her cap.

The Key to Uncle Tom, in England.—A London letter in the Boston Traveler states that the Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin was put in type by Messrs. Low & Son, of London, and printed, bound, and offered for sale, within four days from the receipt of the original copy. This haste was necessary, the laws requiring that it be first published there, in order to secure the author's interest. Another edition was issued by Messrs. Clarke, Beeton & Co., within five days after, which sells at 84 cents. More than ten thousand of this edition were taken by the London Booksellers alone, on the first day of its publication. The Queen dispatched a messenger to Messrs. Low & Son, on the morning of its publication, with a special request for the first copy issued, without regard to the style of binding.

SUMMARY.

A correspondent writes to the Tribune, under date Arkport, April 27th, as follows: "For some distance west of Hornellsville station the tracks of the New York and Erie, and of the Buffalo and New York City Railroads, run side by side. Yesterday, as the trains chanced to be passing each other in opposite directions on these tracks, a carpenter named John Dildine was struck by the cow-catcher of one of the engines with such force as to throw him some distance to one side of the track, causing his death in a few minutes. In order to escape the train he saw approaching, he stepped directly in the way of the other.

Dr. J. V. C. Smith, of Boston, says that immense crops of poppies are raised in Switzerland, not for the opium, but for the oil extracted from their seeds. This oil is beautifully transparent, extensively used in house painting, colorless as water, and when mixed with white lead, leaves a beautiful surface that never becomes yellow. Now that linseed oil is rising in price, and, as much of our land is unfit for the cultivation of flax, he advises the attempt at cultivating the poppy here, which does very well even on poor, sandy soil.

A dispatch dated Rochester, Friday, April 29, says:—About 1 o'clock this morning the Rochester House, a Temperance hotel, was found to be on fire, and, sad to relate, four domestics, three women and one boy, lost their lives. There were about 120 persons in the hotel, many of them families, who were boarders, and the scene of confusion and dismay which occurred is inconceivable. Nothing remained of those who perished but a few charred bones, sufficient to enable the surgeon to designate them.

A telegraphic dispatch dated New Orleans, April 25, says, The steamer Albatross was wrecked on the night of the 10th inst. The passengers and crew only were saved. The Albatross was engaged in the line lately organized for the more speedy conveyance of a mail from the United States to San Francisco, overland, through Mexico to Acapulco. It is said, she was fully insured. She was built in Philadelphia, in 1851, and is valued at about $60,000 or $70,000.

The small-pox, which has been raging at the Oneida Co. Poor-House, at Rome, is now subsiding, and it is confidently hoped will soon entirely disappear. There have been in all some 65 cases, 18 of which have terminated fatally. The deaths have mostly been among the children. There were 285 inmates in the Poor-House at the time the small-pox first appeared there. The number is now reduced to about 170, as every one who could take care of himself has left for fear of the contagion.

A real hunter is Wat Eckman. He lives in Kentucky, and has followed hunting for a livelihood since 1831, within which period he has killed any number of deer, 38 bears, 174 wolves, 3,847 coons, 990 foxes, 761 wild geese, 2,040 pheasants, 44 ground hogs, 80 wild cats, 14 pole cats, 209 minks, besides squirrel, quail, and other small game, beyond his power to calculate. The sum he has realized from his game, skins, &c., falls but little short of twelve thousand dollars.

The New Hampshire State Agricultural Society proposes to offer premiums on the best specimens of patching and darning. It is feared, with good reason, that so much time is bestowed by young ladies upon embroidery and other flummeries, as to cause them to wholly lose the useful art of darning stockings. The ladies who take the premium will likely be in great demand for wives.

A girl seventeen years old was bitten by a rattlesnake on the left instep. Two hours and a half afterward, Dr. T. A. Atchinson, who describes the case in the Southern Medical Journal, visited her, and found her sightless, with her face swollen and her mind wandering. He placed her in a hot salt bath, and administered whisky and carbonate of ammonia until she had taken three pints of the first and eighty grains of the latter. No intoxication followed, and she was cured.

Mr. Robert Gardner, of Lowell, called at a drug store on Wednesday evening for some pulverized rhubarb, and what he supposed was rhubarb was put up by a boy in attendance. He took the medicine just before going to bed, and about 11 o'clock was found to be in great distress, and died in a short time. From the boy it was learned that Mr. Gardner had taken forty grains of pulverized opium instead of rhubarb—the boy understanding him to call for opium.

The Louisville Courier, of the 18th ult., says the steamer P. H. White was seized, about three weeks ago, near Fort Gibson, Ark., by a detachment of the troops there, for violating the "intercourse law between the United States and the Indian tribes." The boat was loaded with whisky designed for sale to the Indians. The cargo was seized, and the officers arrested and put in the guard-house at Fort Gibson.

The quotations of Early Fruits and Vegetables, are new potatoes from Bermuda, 37½ cents per half peck, or $2 per bushel; asparagus, 56 cents per bunch; strawberries, $1 per basket; green peas, 50 cents per half peck; tomatoes from Bermuda, 37½ cents per quart. Most of the green vegetables are brought from Charleston, South Carolina.

Hon. John A. Campbell, the new Judge of the United States Supreme Court, was qualified at Mobile a few days ago. He is a native of Scotland, and the only foreign born citizen on the Supreme Bench. He is a distant connection of John Campbell, (Marquis of Breadalbane,) John F. Campbell, (Earl Cawdor,) John Campbell, (Baron Campbell,) George T. D. Campbell, (Baron Sundridge and Hamilton, and Duke of Argyll,) and Sir A. I. Campbell, Member of the House of Commons from Argyleshire, the representatives of the Scottish nobility.

There is a Mormon Church located at Tom's River, in New Jersey. The building is 30 by 40 feet in size, and there are 30 members of the Society, including some of the influential citizens of the County. Over twenty persons lately removed from this Society to Salt Lake. There is preaching at the Tom's river church twice every Sunday, by the Captain of a schooner, and occasionally sermons from residents of Salt Lake.

The neighborhood of the Crystal Palace—or what there is of it—presented a curious appearance last Sunday. A prodigious crowd of some ten to fifteen thousand thronged about it. We regret to add, there is every appearance that it will be rendered a scene of wide spread dissipation. Dram shops are starting up every where in the neighborhood.

Dwight's Journal of Music says: The City of Milwaukee, in Wisconsin, is in possession of a musical privilege enjoyed at present by no other city in the Union—namely, a German opera, with full orchestra, chorus and principal singers. And what is more, it is likely to be domesticated there, since the perfarmers are all resident Milwaukians.

The Keokuk (Iowa) Dispatch, April 12, says, About one hundred persons leave our city and immediate vicinity for California this season, the most of whom are already upon their way. Some of our oldest citizens have taken their departure, with their families, for the golden land, in the hope of finding a more congenial home beyond the plains.

The Court House at Greenville, Ala., was destroyed by fire on the night of the 12th ult. The South Alabamian says:—"So expeditiously did the fire do its work, that not a single paper could be saved; the county records, everything has been reduced to ashes. There is no calculating the loss which the county and individuals have sustained by this calamity."

MARRIED,

In Almond, April 2, by Eld. N. V. Hull, Milo H. Wygant, Esq., to Miss Amelia McHenry, all of Almond.

In Albion, Wis., March 31st, by Eld. Z. Campbell, Mr. Charles Badger, M. D., of Clyman, Dodge Co., to Miss Samantha Maxson, of Albion.

On the evening of the 24th April, by Eld. D. Clawson, Mr. Henry R. West to Miss Phebe D. Noble, all of Marlboro, N. J.

DIED,

In Williamsburgh, L. I., on Third-day morning, May 3d, Benedict W. Rogers, in the 31st year of his age. His disease was consumption, and during its progress he furnished a happy example of Christian patience and resignation. He was a beloved member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in New York, which he aided by liberal contributions and adorned by a consistent life. Ever since the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society was organized, he has been its Treasurer; and at the time of his death he was a Director of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society, and a Vice-President of the American Sabbath Tract Society. His maturity of judgment, and frank, unassuming address, gave promise of valuable service to his brethren, who are consoled in view of his death only by the belief that the Master had higher service for him.

[The remains will be taken to Waterford, Ct., for interment, where funeral services will be held on Fifth-day afternoon, May 5th, at 2 o'clock.]

At West Edmeston, April 25th, Mrs. Polly Burdick, wife of Ichabod Burdick, and daughter of the late Dea. Joshua Maxson, of Brookfield, in the 53d year of her age. She professed religion and united with the Third Seventh-day Baptist Church of Brookfield about twenty years ago, with which she remained an acceptable member till death.

In Independence, April 25th, 1853, of inflammation of the lungs, Thankful, wife of Nathan Stillman, in the 60th year of her age. She left to friends the hope that she was reconciled to God.

In Greenmanville, Ct., April 16th, William C., infant son of Wm. C. and Lydia A. Tanner, aged 7 months and 9 days.

☞ Persons indebted to the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society, for the Sabbath Recorder, the Sabbath-School Visitor, or the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial, are earnestly requested to make immediate payment. The current financial year of the Society closes five weeks from to-day. Those who neglect paying until the year closes, are liable to an additional charge of fifty cents per volume of the Sabbath Recorder. Persons living near our local agents, should pay to them. Others should remit by mail, which may be done at our risk, provided a description of the bills is left with the postmaster. Postage stamps may be sent for fractional parts of a dollar.

Eastern Association.

THE Seventh-day Baptist Eastern Association will hold its Seventeenth Anniversary with the Church at Piscataway, N. J., commencing on the fifth day of the week before the last Sabbath in May, (26th day of the month,) at 11 o'clock A. M. Preacher, Charles M. Lewis; alternate, Daniel Coon. Committee on Business—D. Dunn, W. B. Gillett. The Executive Committee convenes for its annual session, at the same place, at 9 o'clock A. M. on Fifth-day.

S. S. Griswold, Cor. Sec.

Central Railroad Company of New Jersey.

NEW YORK TO EASTON, PA. Fare, $1 75.—Fall Arrangements, commencing November 15, 1852. Leave Pier No. 1 North River daily, for Easton and intermediate places at 8 A. M., 12 M., and 3.45 P. M., and for Somerville at 4.45 P. M. Returning, leave Phillipsburg at 6 and 9 A. M., and 3.15 P. M.

New York and Erie Railroad.

TRAINS leave pier foot of Duane-st., New York, as follows:

Express Train at 7 A.M. for Dunkirk, connecting with first-class steamboats for Cleveland, Sandusky, Toledo, and Monroe, and railroads to Cincinnati and Chicago.

Mail Train at 8 A.M. for all stations.

Way Train at 3½ P.M., via Piermont, for Delaware.

Night Express Train at 5 P.M. for Dunkirk, connecting with first-class steamboat for Detroit direct, connecting with Express Train for Chicago.

Emigrant Train at 5 P.M., via Piermont.

Hudson River Railroad.

WINTER ARRANGEMENT. Trains leave Chambers-st. daily, for Albany and Troy—

Express Train at 6 A. M., through in 4 hours, connecting with Trains reaching Buffalo or Montreal at 8 o'clock same evening.

Mail Train 8 A. M. Through Way Train 1 P. M.

Express Train 5 P. M. Accommodation Train 6 P. M.

For Tarrytown at 2 P. M., and an Evening Train at 11 o'clock.

For Poughkeepsie at 10.30 A. M. and 4 P. M.

For Peekskill at 5.30 P. M.

The Tarrytown, Peekskill, and Poughkeepsie Trains stop at all Way Stations.

Passengers taken at Chambers, Canal, Christopher, 14th, and 31st-sts.

SUNDAY TRAINS from Canal-st. at 7.30 A. M. for Poughkeepsie, and at 5 P. M. for Albany, stopping at all Way Stations.

For Albany, Direct.

THE new and magnificent steamer FRANCIS SKIDDY, Capt. Thomas S. Knight, will leave the Steamboat Pier foot of Robinson-st. Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Sundays, at 6 o'clock P. M. Fare 50 cents. For freight or passage apply on board, or to JAMES McCULLOUGH, Jr., No. 92 Warren-st.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Titsworths & Dunn, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses; Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

"THE AMERICAN SLAVE CODE, IN THEORY AND PRACTICE: Its distinctive features shown by its Statutes, Judicial Decisions, and Illustrative Facts." By William Goodell, author of the "Democracy of Christianity," "Slavery and Anti Slavery," &c. New York: American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 48 Beekman street. The work contains 430 pages 12 mo, neatly bound in cloth, and will be sold for cash at 75 cents single copy, $6 per dozen, and $45 per hundred. Also, in paper covers, at a deduction of 10 cents per copy from the above prices

Orders may be forwarded to Lewis Tappan, 48 Beekman street, New York.

Extract of a Letter from Hon. Wm. Jay to the Author.

"Your analysis of the slave laws is very able, and your exhibition of their practical application by the Southern Courts, evinces great and careful research." "Your book is as impregnable against the charge of exaggeration as Euclid's Geometry, since, like that, it consists of propositions and demonstrations. The book is not only true, but it is unquestionably true."

Miscellaneous.

Ruins in New-Mexico.

At a recent meeting of the Maryland Historical Society, a letter, dated Fort Fillmore, N. M., Jan. 15, 1853, from Col. D. S. Miles, of the U. S. Army, was read, and excited a very deep and lively interest among the members present. The material portion of the letter is as follows:—

Lieut. Abert, of the Topographical Engineers, is the only officer of the Army that ever had the opportunity of visiting Gran Quivira. He went to a deserted village called Abo, in lat. 34 deg. 25 m., lon. 106 W., and says he was within fourteen miles of it, and its direction was east. This may be correct; but my information would lead me to infer it lies further south and east from Abo. Since I wrote the article in the Arkansas paper, I have accidentally become acquainted with an old man, named Campbell, who is represented as a respectable and truthful man, who has visited Quivira on two occasions—the first time in 1839, when he was run off by the Indians; the next visit in 1842, with a larger party, and staid there a week exploring or digging here and there for treasure. I will, as far as my memory permits, give you his description in his own words:

He found the site of the Gran Quivira on a mesa or table land, situated on the north-west point of the Sacramenta Mountains, having the appearance of a large and populous city, regularly laid out in wide streets at right angles. He supposes the city in length to be at least three miles, running north-east to south-west, and half a mile or more in breadth; some of the houses, in part, still standing, and built of hewn stone. There are clear indications of the size of the houses, and many of them are of a very large size; or at least cover much ground. One he thought he recognized as the palace, another as the Temple, or place of worship; and here he thought it most probable he would find the treasure.

He sounded about and discovered a hollow place; cleaned away the dirt, and reached a floor; dug through it, thinking he was getting into a cellar, but found a room entirely empty, about 16 to 18 feet square, with polished walls, and with paintings, or colored figures, all over it, and ascertained, for the first time, that he was then on the level with the street, which is now 10 to 15 feet below the present surface. He and his party used this room as a dwelling while at the place. He dug at another place, which he supposed to be at the altar, and came to a flat rock; on clearing away the rubbish, he discovered where it had been excavated, and nicely covered by a close-fitting, hewn, flat rock. He was sure of a prize, raised the rock, and found in a carved-out hole in the solid rock, the skeleton of a human body, Indian in appearance, the whole perfect, but which, in a few moments, by exposure to the air, dissolved; not leaving a particle of evidence of a human corpse, but fine dust. On digging further at that place, he found four such vaults and human skeletons.

He abandoned the town and went back to the hills, and found a cave, but on opening the mouth, discovered it to be the shaft of a mine. This he followed for nearly a quarter of a mile, seeing throughout evidences of a shining mineral on all sides. At the end of the shaft was a small chamber, where he found a crow-bar of some metal, but not of iron, quite black; a chisel and a hammer, or kind of axe, also black; and a curious kind of earthen vessel. He left these things where he found them, and returned to the town. In rambling round to the western part, he found what was the reservoir, in the form of an ellipse; its axis must be 150 yards in length; its breadth at least 80, and its depth about 50 feet, paved bottom and sides with hewn stone. At the southernmost end of the reservoir, was a very large house, of cut stone, several stories high, which seems to have been a place of arms, and intended as a guard house, to defend this pond of water, as, at regular intervals, there were long slits, and a kind of port-holes left in the wall.

The walls are four feet thick; one corner, perhaps half, of this house is still standing. There is no water or wood near Gran Quivira. The whole country round for many miles is a desolate plain of sand. At the northern end of the reservoir, the aqueduct comes in; this he followed to the White Mountains, forty miles in a north-west direction. It is, throughout its length, faced with small cut stone, (not brick,) both on the sides and bottom, and cemented. In width it is about twelve feet, and about ten in depth—sufficient to carry a mountain stream, which no longer runs in it, owing to the obstruction of rubbish at its mouth, but which now pursues its course to the Pecos river. There is also a broad paved avenue leading directly east from Gran Quivira, near one hundred feet in width, which Mr. Campbell followed for forty miles, and he left it, supposing it to be a road which led to Nacogdoches, in Texas. About twenty miles from Gran Quivira, on the northern side of this road, he found quite a large village in ruins. At Gran Quivira there is an abundance of painted pottery and earthen vessels, but he found no metallic ones.

The India Rubber Tree of Brazil.

Kidd's Journal, an English publication, furnishes these particulars respecting the caoutchouc, or india rubber tree, of Brazil:—

"The caoutchouc tree grows, in general, to the height of forty or fifty feet without branches; then branching runs up fifteen feet higher. The leaf is about six inches long, thin, and shaped like that of a peach tree. The trees show their working by the number of knots or bunches, made by tapping; and a singular fact is, that when most tapped, they give most milk or sap. As the time of operating is early day, before sunrise the tappers are on hand. The blacks are first sent through the forest, armed with a quantity of soft clay, and a small pick-axe. On coming to one of the trees, a portion of the clay is formed into a cup, and stuck to the trunk. The black then striking his pick over the cup, the sap oozes out slowly, a tree giving out daily about a gill. The tapper continues in this way, tapping, perhaps, fifty trees, when he returns, and with a jar, passing over the same ground, empties his cups. So, by seven o'clock, the blacks come in with their jars ready for working. The sap at this stage, resembles milk in appearance, and somewhat in taste. It is also frequently drank with perfect safety. If left standing now, it will curdle like whey. Shoemakers now arrange themselves to form the gum. Seated in the shade, with a large pan of milk on one side, and on the other a flagon, in which is burned a nut, peculiar to this country, emiting a dense smoke, the operator having his last, or form, held by a long stick or handle, previously besmeared with soft clay, in order to slip off the shoe when finished, holds it over the pan, and pouring on the milk till it is covered, sets the coating in a smoke, then, giving it a second coat, repeats the smoking; and so on with a third and a fourth, till the shoe is of the required thickness, averaging from six to twelve coats.

"When finished, the shoes on the forms are placed in the sun the remainder of the day to drip. Next day, if required, they may be figured, being so soft that any impression will be indelibly received. The natives are very dexterous in this work. With a quill and sharp pointed stick, they will produce finely lined leaves and flowers, such as you may have seen on the shoes, in an incredibly short space of time. After remaining on the forms two or three days, the shoes are cut open on the top, allowing the last to slip out. They are then tied together ready for the market. There peddlers and Jews trade for them with merchants, who have them stuffed with straw, and packed in boxes to export. In the same manner, any shape may be manfactured.

Thus, toys are made on clay forms. After drying, the clay is broken and extracted. Bottles, etc., are made in the same way. According as the gum grows older, it becomes darker in color and more tough. The number of caoutchouc trees in the province is countless. In some parts, whole forests exist, and they are frequently cut down for fire-wood. Although the trees exist in Mexico and the East Indies, there appears to be no importation into this country from these places. The reason, we suppose, must be the want of that fruitfulness which is found in them here. The caoutchouc tree may be worked all the year; but, generally in the wet season, they have rest, owing to the flooded state of the woods, and the milk being watery, requires more trouble to manufacture the same article than in the dry season.

The Manufacture of Flax.

At a recent meeting of the London Society of Arts, an interesting paper "on recent improvements in the manufacture of flax," was read by Professor Wilson, late Principal of the Agricultural College at Cirencester. The professor stated the object of dressing the straw, which was to separate the inner fibre from the two outer ones. Two methods of dressing had been hitherto resorted to, the mechanical and the chemical; in the former, the flax was dealt with in a dry, in the latter in a wet state. For a poor quality of flax, the mechanical process was preferable, on account of the expense of steeping. As this process did not touch the azotised substance found in flax, it left it with the liability to fermentation, and consequent deterioration of the fabric, under certain conditions. Patents for improvements had been taken out in 1812 and 1819; but none of the methods removed the liability to fermentation. This could only be done by the chemical processes. In one, the fermentation was directly excited; in another, the azotised substances were steeped out. Two principles had been recently brought into operation, which were likely to effect a complete revolution in the manufacture of flax. Having described the method of steeping as hitherto practiced in Ireland and on the Continent, by immersing in water, still or running, or by "dew-rotting," the object of which was to excite and exhaust the fermentative action—the professor observed, that the use of hot water materially accelerated the process. This was known to and practiced by the Malays and Bengalese.

It was not, however, until 1846, that a patent had been taken out, by a German named Schenk, for the scalding or hot-water process. It was introduced into Ireland in 1848, and now upward of 40,000 tuns of flax were prepared in this way every year in Ireland. That useful body, the Flax Improvement Society, had instituted a series of experiments, the result of which was, that Schenk's process gave an advantage of 20 per cent. in the yield, and a still greater advantage in the spinning quality of the flax. The result of a large rottery near Belfast was that 67 tuns of straw yielded 39½ tuns after steeping, which, when scutched, were reduced to 5.9 tuns, and about 1½ tuns of tow or plucking, a much larger result than was obtainable by other means. Another chemical process, instead of exhausting the fermentative qualities of the flax, made use of alkalies to dissolve out the azotised substances. This had been first suggested so long ago as 1747, had been carried out to a great extent in Prussia, and was well known to the French chemist Bernouille, Gay Lussac, and others. While the cold water process occupied from seven to fourteen days, Schenk's process reduced the time to from 72 to 96 hours. Recently, however, Mr. Watts, of Glasgow, has patented a method of applying steam to the same purpose; and this was done with so much effect, that the process might be expected soon to become general.

The advantages of this process were—a great saving of time, from eight to twelve hours being sufficient to bring the flax into a condition fit for scutching; the operation of scutching was facilitated; the fibre was improved; there was extremely little waste; and the production of noxious gases was avoided. Messrs. Leadbitter, of Belfast, had adopted this process, and had invited the attention of the council of the Flax Improvement Society, who, in November last, reported that 10½ cwt. of flax, after being steamed 11 hours, was reduced to 7 cwt. 11 lbs.; after scutching it yielded 187 lbs. of fine flax, 12 lbs. 6½ oz. of fine scutching tow, and 35 lbs. 3 oz. of coarse tow—being about 18 lbs. of fine flax for every cwt. of tow. Only 36 hours were required for the whole process of converting the straw into fine flax fit for the spinner; and the cost was not more than £10 per tun. Samples were sent into the market, and fetched from £56 to £70 per tun. No sooner had the committees pronounced in favor of this process, than another was patented by another ingenious Scotchman, Mr. Buchanan, who, instead of employing steam, as in Mr. Watt's process, at once applied to the straw hot water raised to a high temperature by means of condensed steam. The principle was to keep up a series of immersions in hot water, whereby a much greater effect was produced than by allowing the flax to remain in the same hot water. Ten such immersions were sufficient to produce all the cupying not more than a few minutes each. By this process the steeping water, instead of becoming the receptacle of noxious products, was nothing more than flax tea, and its feeding properties were quite equal to what was well known as distillers wash. In Ireland it was used for feeding pigs and cattle. The Professor said that he had seen many experiments on the processes of Mr. Buchanan's patent, and he believed it would be highly successful, the quality of the flax being equal to that produced by any of the other processes, and a great saving of manual labor being effected. The process of scutching was then described, and the superiority of mill-scutching over the hand process pointed out. In England there were 25,000 to 300,000 spindles at work; in Scotland, upward of 300,000; in Ireland, about 500,000; being a total of upward of a million. The fixed capital invested in the spinning and weaving process in England was estimated at five millions. On the continent the greater portion of the manufacture was still performed by hand labor. The requirements of this country considerably exceeded the production. About 70,000 tuns of flax fiber were imported every year, besides 65,000 tuns of linseed, and 70,000 tuns of oil-cake, for the feeding of cattle; making a total of between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000 paid to other countries for an article which this country was well calculated to produce.

Mr. Davey, the gentleman referred to above, said he had patented some machinery for preparing flax by the dry process, but he had not yet brought it publicly forward; the reason was, he did not wish to appear as a rival of Chevalier Claussen. His plan was to get rid of the ligneous portion of the plant, which constituted three-fourths of its bulk, before proceeding to treat it chemically; for he had never proposed to confine himself entirely to mechanical processes. He had seen some works at Belfast on Schenk's principle, but did not approve the flax thus produced. So lately as last evening he had learned from Mr. Cobden, M. P., in the lobby of the House of Commons, that a relative of his, who had commenced the manufacture on Schenk's process, had abandoned it, and gone somewhere on the Continent. Mr. Davey proceeded to point out some objections to the steam and hot water processes.

New Discovery of Electrical Influence.

It is the general impression among scientific men, that only a small portion of the power and influence of electricity has yet been developed. One of its recent applications has been the lighting of cities. As one of the results of this new application, we notice the following statement, which we copy from the Paris Correspondent of the National Intelligencer:—

Science, particularly electrical science, seems to be making fresh triumphs every day. We have now to record a new application of electricity by Dr. Joseph Watson, which is exhibiting in the neighborhood of Wandsworth. The great feature of the invention is, that the materials consumed in the production of electrical light, are employed for a profitable purpose, independent of the illumination, and more than remunerating the entire expense; so that the light, which is rendered constant and brilliant, is produced for nothing. Thus, while the light is being produced by galvanic action, materials are introduced into the battery by which pigments of the finest quality are obtained; these are so valuable, that they considerably exceed the entire cost of the operation. Dr. Watson thus speaks of his invention in a pamphlet not yet published:—

"Our battery we have termed the chromatic battery, and its produce is colors. It may seem difficult to imagine how any number of galvanic arrangements can be made to yield a great variety of colors; but when it is remembered that the real number of natural colors is small, and that a difference of tint and shade imparts to each separate product a distinct commercial existence as a color, we may then be believed when we say, that by the use of not more than five substances introduced into our batteries, we are able to produce no less than one hundred valuable pigments, exceeding in value, by a great per centage, the original value of the articles contributing toward their production. Our mode of producing these colors consists, not in any subsequent mixing of the products resulting from the working of our batteries, but is the result of the actual development of the electricity in the battery."

The exact process cannot be made intelligible by a short extract from the pamphlet, but the discovery is allowed to be the most valuable, and its perfect accomplishment undoubted.

Egyptian Travel.

Mr. Bryant writes to the Evening Post, under date of Cairo, Egypt, January 12th, in this wise:—

From time to time we passed villages on the bank built of unburnt brick, with low, flat roofs, looking like the habitations of mud-wasps magnified. Each had its mosque, with a minaret of hewn store, from which the hour of prayer is proclaimed. Their inmates, in turbans and long blue or white cotton shirts, were creeping out of them in the early sunshine, and walking carefully on the wet and slippery declivity. Among them were women in blue cotton gowns, barefooted, with infants perched on their shoulders. This is the way in which the Arab mothers, of the laboring class in Egypt, carry their children. As soon as the little creatures get the necessary use of their limbs, they are transferred from the arms to the shoulders. I have seen instances of this custom, which would supply striking subjects for the pencil. At old Cairo, the other day, a Coptic woman, in the loose blue dress of the country, barefooted, her face unvailed, with dark, symmetrical features, silent and sad-looking, opened to us the door of the old worm-eaten church in which is the little grotto where the holy Virgin, with her child, is said to have eluded the pursuit of Herod. On the woman's shoulders sat an infant of seven or eight months, as silent as the mother, with well-burned brown cheeks, and long, dark eye-lashes, its head bowed upon hers, and one little hand pressed against her forehead, while the other arm was passed around the back of the neck. The Egyptian mothers treat their children with great tenderness; and, though I see infants everywhere, I do not know that I have yet heard one of them cry. The expression of quiet resignation in their faces is often quite touching. The Egyptian, born to a lot of dirt, poverty, and oppression, may well learn

At eight o'clock in the morning we reached the Nile, and were transferred to a steamer. About half of the passengers of the Ripon had been sent on a little before us by another. We passed a day on the Nile, and had ample opportunity to observe the character of the great river and its banks. It is a turbid stream, like the Mississippi, flowing rapidly toward the ocean, between banks of fine mold, which are easily undermined, and crumble into the current. The broad, level tracts by which it is bordered have the same dark rich soil as that which lies about our rivers of the west. Along the bank where the current has worn its away, you see, distinctly, the layers of mold, which, year after year, have been deposited by the successive inundations, and which attest that the land of Egypt has been gradually rising for ages. The bed of the river appears to have been raised, also, in an equal degree; and I have been told by those who have made the examination for themselves, that, although in some places the sands of the desert, blown by the winds, have encroached upon the fertile grounds, in others the area of fertility has been extended. Broad tracts of sand, which the waters never reached before, have been overlaid by the slime of the river, and, after one or two inundations, covered with harvests.

Our captain and his crew were Egyptians, though the engineer was an Englishman, and set us an edifying example of Mohammedan devotion. As the Mussulman prays four times a day, and not more than one of the hands could be spared from his employment at any one time, there was scarcely an hour of the day in which some one of them was not in the act of prayer. Each of them, as his turn came, mounted the right wheel-house and made his prostrations, and murmured his devotions, with closed eyes and moving lips, in the presence of all the passengers.

A Village Overwhelmed.

A traveler in Switzerland, writing to the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, gives the following thrilling account of the destruction of the village of Goldau.

Many feet under the rough rocks on which the actual church of Goldau stands, is a buried village, which, if it were rather less crushed and ground to pieces, some 1900 years hence, might be as curious a mine for eager New Zealanders, as Pompeii is for us now. It is the older village of the same name which in 1806 was overwhelmed by a mountain fall. Much more terrible the catastrophe must have been, than any shower of slow ashes. Though, if one were to choose his death between the two, he would prefer annihilation by a flying boulder to a slower sulphurous suffocation in his back cellar. The mountain that did this mischief was a staid, grave pile, two miles away, and was so little distrusted, that it was covered like the rest of the hills around, with chalets and pastures, chewing cows and whistling peasants. Any geologist would have hesitated to live upon it, however, for though the whole long slope from Goldau to the distant summit was of firm rock, covered by rich soil, deep underneath there was a treacherous stratum of clay. Yielding to the temptation of the autumn rains, this mountain took a drop too much. The clay became slush, and down the greased ways the whole vast mass slid upon the valley. Any one who has seen a large vessel launched, can conceive, perhaps, what impetus a mass of rock, of the weight of millions of loaded ships, would get in sliding a distance of two miles down a slope 5,000 feet high. But it is almost impossible to conceive of the desolation scattered before it. The whole broad valley, for a distance of four or five miles, and a breadth of two or three, was filled with ghastly rubbish. The sky was utterly blackened by a cloud of flying stones and dust. High up the opposite side of the valley, where, if nature had issued tickets, a spectator would have taken his place without hesitation to witness the convulsion, volleys of immense rocks were hurled like grape shot, carrying all before them. The church bell of Goldau was found knocked a mile; and one village chapel was swept half a league from its foundation. Of those who were immediately exposed, only three escaped. One child and a servant were dug out the day after, and perhaps a more vivid idea of the calamity may be got from the story of the servant, Francisca, than from any vague conception.

It was about tea-time of a September afternoon. She was sitting in a back room, amusing the child, when she heard some one shout, "Run for your life." She snatched up the child, jumped toward the door, but before she reached it, the house was struck and sent spinning down the valley. She instantly lost the child, and was thrown from the floor against the ceiling, against the sides, every way; the furniture, and shortly the broken boards of the floor, joining in this strange dance, beams cracking and splintering with terrific noise, and the house gradually falling to pieces. Presently it stopped. Awaking from her giddy, dizzy delirium, she discovered that she was alive, and brushing away the blood which filled her eyes, she found herself almost suffocated, in the dark, her body half crushed, and immoveably jammed between beams and broken stones, her feet uppermost. Shortly after, she was amazed to hear the child near her, crying. She spoke to her. The child said she was against some stones, and couldn't move, but she saw the daylight and some bushes, and she wanted to know what the matter was, and when people were going to take her out. Francisca was shocked, and told her, with usual simplicity, that it was the day of judgment—that there were no people left—that presently she would find herself in a bright light, and that would be heaven, and she musn't be frightened, but must pray. So they prayed till the child got tired and cried for her supper.

About this time Francisca heard a village clock, which disproved her theory, and comforted her. She soothed the child's cries, which finally ceased entirely, and she thought her dead. All night the poor woman passed in this cruel posture, and it is curious that her suffering was not so much from bruises or loss of blood, as the exceeding coldness of her feet. At last, by prodigious effort, she partially extricated her legs, and so waited death. With the new day, a dim light reached her, and the child awoke, and again moaned. These moans the father heard, for it happened that he was near, digging the bodies of his wife and smaller child out of the ground, where they had been found. The child, when released, said she had been talking with Francisca, and by a great deal of labor, she was rescued and saved. The child's thigh was broken, and the servant was for a long time blind, and what was quite excusable, was always subject afterwards to convulsions of terror.

The other child saved was an infant, found lying on its straw mattress, upon a stream of mud, with no vestige of the house in which it had been left! Four hundred and fifty men, women, and children, were buried alive in the mass, and more than 3,000 buildings disappeared. Nature has drawn a partial screen of moss and grass and bushes over the chaos of the valley, and men have built a road over it, and a church and a tavern on the site of the principal village destroyed, but the mountain side is bare and scathed, and the terrible ruin will be forever evident.

A Child Lost in the Woods.

On Thursday, says the Paris (U. C.) Star, a little girl of the name of Mary Ann Egan, only three years and three months old, strayed from her father's house, situate between this village and Brantford, and not being found after diligent search, it was supposed that she had fallen into Whiteman's Creek, and was drowned. Rewards were offered for the recovery of her body, and the child was given up for lost. During Saturday night a dog went to the house of a farmer in the township of Brantford, some distance from the place where the child had strayed, and barked violently at the door, and having succeeded in awakening the family, was driven away, but returned again and again, and by his actions evidently wanted some of the family to follow him, but no notice was taken of his movements. In the morning the farmer told his son to go into the woods and search for sassafras roots, and in so doing he very providentially found the poor little girl. She was nearly dead from exhaustion, produced by cold and hunger, having eaten nothing for three days, except a little grass. She is, we are happy to say, in a fair way of recovery. It appears from her statement, that having disobeyed her mother in some trifling matter, she was afraid to go home, and walked on till she lost her way. The dog found her, and licked her hands, face and feet, and laid by her to keep her warm; and but for the warmth derived from this intelligent animal, she could not possibly have lived through an exposure of three days and nights, during which there was a severe hail storm.

Thurlow Weed at Work.—The following sketch of the editorial habits of the editor of the Albany Evening Journal, Thurlow Weed, is from the Madison County Whig:—

"Somewhere we have seen a sketch of Weed in his sanctum, as it was a couple of years since. A large, plain room, containing a few tables, chairs, and a sofa, and separated by a partition, pierced with a broad window, from the composing room, was occupied by him in common with his assistants. No room could be less private. Near one corner was the table of the editor, behind a pile of exchanges, cast aside and trampled down by his feet, to keep them from overwhelming him and his table. Here he received calls from State officers, members of the Legislature, applicants for office, and casual visitors. In the intervals of conversation he wrote his editorials. Not hastily, as may be supposed, but slowly, and with many erasures. His accuracy is the fruit of incessant care. He writes much, but always with attention, and with more thought for his readers than for the unlucky compositor who puts his articles in type. His manuscript is a combination of fish-hooks, fly specks, dashes and cork-screws, which at times defy deciphering and guesses, editor and compositor alike 'giving it up.' It is a clear case of that 'easy writing which is hard reading.' About 3 o'clock his last article is in type and corrected, and his work for the day is ended. Thenceforward he is at leisure, apparently as fresh and vigorous as though he had not just risen from seven or eight hours of the most exhausting labor in the world."

A Regular Wild-Cat Bill.—An Indiana paper describes a bill of the Wild Cat currency in that State, and which it would be difficult to counterfeit. "The vignette is a nigger shearing a hog, supposed to be squealing. The President of the Bank stands near, assisting to hold the hog. The dear people may be discovered a good ways behind. Thunder and lightning in the foreground. The picture of a seedy individual 'secured by stock,' through which his feet run, adorns one corner. A man with a very black countenance, supposed to be the Auditor of the State, and being rode upon a rail by a couple of Wall-street sharpers, is seen in another corner. The phiz of Gov. Wright, thunder gathering on his brow, and lightning flashing from his eyes, adorns the centre of the bill. On one side of the Governor is a hawk, on the other side a buzzard. He holds in one hand the scales of Justice, one side of which is evidently very light, the other is holding a document, his last Message, from which he appears to be reading to a crowd of disconsolate individuals, who refuse to be comforted."

Wrought Iron Car Wheels.—Since the sad accident which resulted in the death of the son of President Pierce, the managers of the New-England Railroads have endeavored, if possible, to remove the constant danger of the breakage of car wheels, and the disasters incident on such breakages. We understand that several of our Railroad Companies are now trying the experiment of using wrought iron wheels, and others have ordered three or four sets, for the purpose of testing the possibility of discarding the cast-iron wheels now universally in use.

The wrought-iron car wheels have cast-iron hubs, wrought rims and arms, and the Low-moor tire; whereas the cast-iron wheels have chilled iron rims. These chilled rims are very hard, and are not very easily worn out, but are very liable to be cracked and broken. The wrought tires wear very rapidly, and need to be often replaced. The problem to be solved is, whether, in the long run, the wrought or cast wheels are the best; whether the wear of the one kind exceeds or not the expense of renewing the cracked and broken of the other.

REGENERATION.

Some time in January last, I delivered a series of sermons to the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hartsville, on Moral Depravity, Regeneration, and Atonement. "A Young Teacher," on listening to those sermons, wishing to investigate the subject still farther, asked the opinion of the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder. That opinion was expressed in three quotations from the Bible, without comment. It seems that "An Old Teacher" deemed that reply insufficient to fairly explain the subject, and "quite one-sided." So I deemed it, and so very many deemed it. In the Recorder of April 21st, I find the same opinion re-stated, with explanations and reasons; and since the doctrine here set forth differs very widely from that set forth in the sermons which gave rise to this discussion, I have thought that I might not be deemed an intruder, if I should offer an exposition of the doctrine which was set forth in those sermons. I am happy to find that an "An Old Teacher" has come to the same conclusion as myself on this most interesting subject, and should have been glad to see the reasons for that conclusion published along with it, and most especially since the Editor has given the reason for the opposite conclusion.

It is not at all strange, that men, looking from different stand-points, and biased by widely different systems of education and modes of thought, should come to different conclusions; but I deem it somewhat unfortunate, that there should be such a diversity of opinion on a subject so inseparably connected with the destiny of the soul. The two views held on this subject are so opposed to each other as to admit of no compromise. If the one be true, the other must be false, and consequently fatal in all its bearings on the progress of the gospel in the hearts of men. I shall endeavor to show, in the course of my investigation of this subject, that the doctrine set forth by Bro. Brown is unphilosophical, unscriptural, and most fatal in all its tendencies; and that the conclusion of "An Old Teacher" is philosophical, scriptural, and most blessed in its tendencies.

In order that this issue may be clearly understood, I will state the two propositions as concisely as I can. Bro. Brown believes, as I understand him, that regeneration "is wholly of him who is rich in mercy," (God,) and "that it requires the same exertion of divine power to quicken a dead sinner to the exercise of faith, as it did to quicken the dead body of Jesus Christ, and raise it from the grave." On the other hand, "An Old Teacher" believes, "that regeneration is not brought about by the work of God alone, nor by the work of man alone; but that it cannot be brought about consistently with the character and attributes of God, and the relation that man bears to him, without the conjoined action of both parties." The latter view is that which I shall endeavor to substantiate, by arguments which I hope may have a direct "bearing on the subject."

I, too, with Bro. Brown, believe, that "when the Scriptures represent the natural (unregenerate) man as 'dead in trespasses and sins,' they mean just what they say, namely, that there is no life in him," and also, that "life in this connection is but another term for holiness." Herein consists the true and only distinction between the unregenerate and the regenerate. The one is unholy; the other is holy. This distinction is stated in various terms of synonymous signification, throughout the Bible, and that we may clearly understand what is this unregenerate state, let us refer to the Bible for its definition.

"The wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him."

"Every one shall die for his own iniquity."

"The soul that sinneth, it shall die."

"All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God."

"All unrighteousness is sin."

Thus the Bible uniformly makes this unregenerate state to consist in opposition, in some form, to the government of God. "The carnal mind is enmity against God." Sin is the most common term used to express this state. It is the depravity of the soul which constitutes its unregenerateness, and this depravity consists wholly in sin. I do not now mean physical depravity, such as man inherits from his progenitors, but moral depravity or sin, such as every man manufactures for himself. It is this depravity against which the Bible thunders its anathemas; it is sin alone which results in death; so that if this unregenerateness does not consist in sin, then God has never informed us in what it does consist, nor what will be its consequences.

If it be claimed, that depravity is some undefinable substance, essence, or attribute of the soul, and that sin is only the necessary result of this depravity, then I reply that the unregenerate man is not at all responsible for that attribute of his nature, since he did not create it, and consequently not at all responsible for its necessary consequence, or sin. Now, since it is for his sin alone that the sinner is to suffer eternal damnation, no intelligent being can fail to perceive the injustice of such a punishment, especially since the same God who punishes him for his sin, created that very nature out of whose depravity his sin comes as a necessary consequence. The depravity or unregenerateness, then, of the sinner, is not part, parcel, or attribute of that nature with which his Maker endowed him. It is something which he produces himself, and this alone is the ground of his responsibility.

If, then, sin, unrighteousness, unholiness, enmity against God, be the characteristic of the unregenerate man, it is of vast moment to know exactly in what this sin consists, before we can see the true nature of regeneration. To this the Bible gives a ready answer. "All unrighteousness is sin," and "sin is the transgression of the law." The "transgression of the law," then, is the sum and substance, the alpha and omega, of the sinner's depravity, or unregenerateness. Now let us inquire what constitutes a regenerate man. "I delight to do thy will, O my God; yea, thy law is written in my heart." "He that is of God heareth God's words." "He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." "But whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected." Thus we see that sin, or transgression of the law, is the characteristic of the unregenerate man—is his depravity—is that alone which gives occasion for his regeneration; while the characteristic of the regenerate man is obedience to that same law, or exactly the opposite of the other. The one disobeys, whereas the other obeys. The one is unholy—the other is holy. Now regeneration is nothing more nor less than passing from the one of these states to the other. When the disobedient becomes obedient, the unregenerate becomes regenerate, and this transmutation constitutes the whole of regeneration.

The question at issue then is, What agencies are employed in this change from disobedience to obedience—from unholiness to holiness? The position of Bro. B. is, that "it is wholly of him who is rich in mercy." If this be true, the sinner has no agency whatever in "ceasing to do evil and learning to do well." It is no part of the sinner's work to cease from disobeying, or sinning. It is not the sinner who leaves off unholiness, and puts on holiness. God alone does all this. God divests him of sin, and clothes him with righteousness. In all this the sinner acts no part—is entirely passive in the hands of God. At some moment, perhaps, all unexpectedly, God comes and seizes him, whether he will or will not, and sets him over the mighty gulf which separates the sinner from the saint. He finds himself, without any agency of his own, a holy man, i. e. an obedient man. Such is the strange doctrine I have undertaken to refute.

Opposed to this is the proposition, that in passing over from disobedience to obedience, from sin to holiness, the sinner, conjointly with God, acts a most important part—is a most essential agent; and that unless he act this part, constituted as he is, and related as he is to God's moral government, omnipotence itself could never perform the change. This change, when produced, is a change of moral character, a change of that by which God judges all men; so that, before it occurs, he threatens eternal damanation, and that too because it does not occur; but when it occurs, he promises eternal life, because it occurs.

We speak of men's actions as good or bad, not because the actions themselves are good or bad—for actions, as such, have no moral character—but because they are the result of a certain state or action of mind, which constitutes true moral character. Hence the Scriptures every where represent man's actions as the true exponent of their moral character. Now, as every intelligent act put forth by a moral agent is either obedience or disobedience, every act involves holiness or unholiness. Where does this holiness reside? All agree that moral character resides alone in the intention, choice, or willing. Thus, when the command of God is known, and the subject puts forth an effort of will to accomplish that command, he has already obeyed it; e. g., God commands some servant of his to go and preach the gospel to the heathen; that servant at once acquiesces, and wills to go; that willing is obedience. So, on the other hand, disobedience is an act of will, against the known law of God, which, when put forth, stamps the individual with all the turpitude of the crime, before that act of will is manifested by any external act of body.

Thus it appears, that moral depravity, such as characterizes the unregenerate, resides in the will and in the will alone; and hence regeneration is simply a change of will, which brings it from opposition to God's will, as expressed in his law, into parallelism to that will.

Now, what are the agencies employed in producing this change of will?

1st. God by the Holy Spirit urges the truth upon the mind. The truth, as embraced in the gospel, is the instrument, and God or the Holy Spirit is the agent by which that truth is brought home to the conscience of the sinner, and held there, as it is published by the faithful minister of Christ, or as presented in the Bible. Now, when the eloquent pleadings of the Spirit have burnt the truth into the sinner's very soul, so that he sees it, feels it, believes it, he is not yet regenerate. The very devils believe the truth; but a clear perception of truth, though a necessary antecedent of regeneration, is no part of it. Something yet remains to be done, and that something is a change of the will from an attitude of opposition to truth, into an attitude of acquiescence with the truth, which the Holy Spirit has urged upon the mind, as above stated. The law is clearly perceived, by the influence of the Spirit, and the will now puts forth its volitions in accordance with the perceived law or obligation. This change of the attitude of the will is regeneration, and this is entirely the work of the subject, and not of God. God's work is performed, and all performed, when he sends the Holy Spirit to hold and urge the truth to the sinner's mind; and the sinner's work is all done when he puts forth volitions in accordance with such truth.

Thus both God and the subject have their respective agencies in this important work of passing from death unto life. Each of these agencies is alike indispensable to the accomplishment of the change. If God should withdraw the Holy Spirit, the work would never be accomplished. So, if the sinner should not put forth his volitions, it would never be accomplished. Now God is always faithful to his part of the work; but not so the sinner. He often resists the the Holy Spirit, and dies unregenerate, after God has most faithfully done all that belongs to him to do in the work of regeneration. Upon every unregenerate sinner on the earth, who has the light of the gospel, God has performed his share in the work of regeneration, and now calls upon the sinner to do his share also, viz., to turn his stubborn will. Acts 7: 51—"Ye stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost." Matt. 23: 37—"Oh, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them that were sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." The truth had come to the children of Jerusalem, in the burning words of the prophets; the Holy Spirit had wrought with them; God had done all for them that he could do, consistently with his moral government; and yet the blessed Jesus stood weeping over their unregeneracy. They had a part to act, and because they did not act it, the burning curse of Almighty God fell upon them. Thus it will be with every unregenerate sinner, when he stands before the Judge of the Universe. He will then learn the fatal error into which false teachings have led him. He will learn that he is unregenerate because he "would not" be regenerate. Such is the teaching of sound philosophy, and such the teaching of the Bible, if it teaches any thing at all on this subject, so fraught with the destiny of immortal spirits.

In presenting us with the Scripture testimony on this subject, Bro. Brown has fallen into the same error that Unitarians are accustomed to fall into in defending their peculiar tenets. They would prove that Jesus Christ was not God, and to do this they present us with an array of texts which show conclusively that he was a man. All this is true; he was a man; but this is not the whole truth, for he was also a God. So an array of texts is presented us, showing that God performs an important part in the work of regeneration. All this is true, but it is not the whole truth, for man performs an equally well-defined and important part. I wonder not that "An Old Teacher" thought this very "one-sided."

Now let us turn to the Bible, and see what is its whole teaching on this subject. The passages quoted to show the agency of God in the work of regeneration are as follows:

James 1: 18—"Of his own will begat he us, with the word of truth."

John 1: 13—"Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God."

Eph. 2: 5—"But God, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ."

These passages, and many others, point out both the agency of God and the instrumentality of the truth in regeneration. The "word of truth" is here declared to be the instrument used by God in regenerating the sinner. Again, 1 Pet. 1: 23—"Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever."

Now it seems to me, that if the Bible had taught nothing more on this subject, the fact here taught, that the "word of truth" is the instrument employed in regeneration, sufficiently indicates that the agency of the subject is requisite for the completion of the work; for, certainly, regeneration is not accomplished till this "word of truth" is embraced and practically applied, which is exclusively the work of the subject and not of God.

But we are not left to inferences. The word of God is clear, and unmistakable on this point. James 4: 8—"Cleanse your hands, ye sinners, and purify your hearts, ye double-minded." Is. 1: 16, 17—"Wash you; make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well." Jer. 4—"Thus saith the Lord to the men of Judah and Jerusalem, Break up your fallow ground;" "O Jerusalem, wash thine heart from wickedness, that thou mayest be saved." Ezek. 18: 31, 32—"Make you a new heart, and a new spirit, for why will ye die, O house of Israel? For I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God; wherefore, turn yourselves, and live ye."

Now, if the above passages do not teach that the sinner has a very important part to act in regeneration, it would be highly edifying to know what they do teach.

But the true state of the case is most clearly and beautifully stated in 1 Pet. 1: 22—"Seeing ye have purified your souls, in obeying the truth, through the Spirit, unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently." Here the agencies, the instruments, and the result of regeneration are clearly and unequivocally stated. The thing done is the purifying of the soul, (regeneration;) and "ye have purified your souls." The mode of purifying the soul is "in obeying the truth." The influence which induced this obedience, or purification, is "through the Spirit." The result is, "unfeigned love." This beautiful and comprehensive text is of itself a sufficient refutation of all the sophistry by which learned divines, ever since the days of Zeno, have sought to repudiate human agency in the regeneration of the soul.

Bro. Brown philosophises on this question in this wise: "Nothing can exceed the limits of its own nature in acting; but if the natural man regenerates himself, he exceeds the limits of his own nature; therefore, man can not regenerate himself." The major proposition of this syllogism is true, but the minor proposition is not true, and consequently the conclusion is not true. The error here arises from confounding sin with man's nature; and this is a common error. Now sin is no part of a man's nature, no attribute of his being. It is just what the Bible and common sense say it is—"a transgression of the law." It is an act of free will, and can be nothing else. To obey the truth, when the Holy Spirit presents it to the mind, is just as natural an act as to disobey it. It is according to a man's nature, to obey God or disobey him, just as he pleases. God has seen fit to create man with the natural attribute of free will, by which he can at all times yield to the influence of the Spirit, and be regenerate or not. Hence obedience is no more exceeding his nature than disobedience.

The consequences of the doctrine held by Bro. Brown, I deem to be most fatal to the progress of the gospel, because it repudiates the very command to go and preach the gospel. If the sinner have no part to act in changing his heart, there is no necessity for preaching to him. If he act no part in this work, the solemn injunction, "Turn ye, turn ye," must fall like idle nonsense on his ear. If it belong to God to convert the sinner altogether, then the preaching should all be done to God. It tends to lull the sinner into security, and teaches him to wait till omnipotent power, "such as quickened the dead body of Jesus Christ, and raised it from the grave," shall come and convert them. O, how many poor souls have stumbled into hell, waiting for God to come and do what he has never promised to do, but which he most clearly commands the sinner to do himself.

If this doctrine be true, there can be no necessary connection between the preached gospel and the conversion of the sinner. That conversion is a work which omnipotent power alone can accomplish, but preaching to the sinner may not at all affect that omnipotent power, and consequently may not at all affect the conversion of the sinner, which is a necessary result of that power. I question whether a sinner was ever converted under the preaching of this doctrine.

It is affirmed that regeneration is a miracle, and boldly asserted by popular theologians, that there is no tendency whatever in the gospel, however presented, to regenerate the heart. Nay, more; Dr. Griffin, in his Park-street lectures, maintains that the gospel necessarily and naturally tends to create and perpetuate hatred of God, while the heart is unregenerate. If this be true, and the most popular doctors of the country have subscribed to it—then it follows, as a necessary consequence, that preaching the gospel is one of the most henious crimes that can be committed against the sinner, since it tends necessarily to sink him deeper in the the depths of hell. I cannot better express my views, in closing, than by adopting the truthful but earnest language of a justly popular and most successful divine and able theologian:

"What must be the effect of telling the sinner that the gospel has nothing to do with regenerating him? Instead of telling him that regeneration is nothing else than his embracing the gospel, to tell him that he must wait and first have his constitution recreated, before he can possibly do any thing but oppose God? This is to tell him the greatest and most abominable and ruinous of falsehoods. It is to mock his intelligence. What! call on him, on pain of eternal death, to believe, to embrace the gospel, to love God with all his heart, and at the same time represent him as entirely helpless, and constitutionally the enemy of God and of the gospel, and as being under the necessity of waiting for God to regenerate his nature before it is possible for him to do otherwise than hate God with all his heart? O, orthodoxy, falsely so called, how false and absurd thou art. What an enemy of God—what a stumbling-block to man! What a leaven of unrighteousness and of hell is such a dogma as this! But a few years have elapsed since almost the entire church was settled down in the delusion of a passive regeneration."

Such are the views which have called forth the discussion of this question thus far. Such I understand to be the teachings of a sound philosophy and of the Bible. To the adoption of these views I believe the progressive tendencies of the age are bringing the church of Christ. If they are true, may God hasten the day of their universal adoption. If not true, they will go where all untruth is destined to go. D. E. M.

TRANSACTING BUSINESS WITH GOD.

In the winter of 1830, the writer was invited into a neighboring village to assist the pastor in a special effort which he had resolved on making for the salvation of sinners in his congregation.

On my arrival I found that arrangements had been made for me to preach that afternoon and evening, and that subsequent appointments were to depend upon the state of feeling manifested at those meetings.

At the close of my afternoon's discourse I told the people that I intended in the evening, as the ambassador of Christ, to bring them the offer of pardon and eternal life from their insulted Maker, and that I wished every impenitent sinner, instead of coming to hear a sermon, to come prepared to give an answer to this offer, and settle the controversy which they had with the Almighty.

In the evening the Church was crowded to overflowing, and there was evidence of much seriousness on the minds of the congregation. I felt myself, and endeavored to make the people feel, that we were assembled under solemn circumstances—that I was not acting in my own name, nor on my own authority, but in the name and on the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ, and that they must answer to him in the judgment day for the manner in which they should treat the message which I brought them. I reminded them that they were lost sinners, condemned already, and lying under the curse of God's broken law, and told them that it was my privilege, as the minister of Christ, to offer every one of them pardon and eternal life in his name; and as though God did beseech them by me, I prayed them in Christ's stead to be reconciled to him. I told them I had no authority to treat with them about repenting and submitting to Christ at some future time—that the Holy Ghost said, To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts—that now was the accepted time, and they must either accept or reject the offer made to them by Christ before they left that place—that their going away without accepting would be rejecting the offer of mercy and hardening their own hearts.

At the close of the services I dismissed the people, and they went home, but not to sleep. Christians went home to pray, and sinners to reflect upon what they had heard.

About one o'clock at night there came a message to the pastor's house, to inform us that a few Christians and a good many impenitent sinners had assembled at the Academy, the former to pray, and the latter to inquire what they must do to be saved, and that they were anxious to have us come to that place. The pastor and my elder, who had gone with me, went with the messenger and remained there the rest of the night; but my health was such that I did not go out till morning, when I found a number rejoicing in hope, and some trembling under a sense of God's wrath, and begging of Christians to pray for them. They felt that they had wickedly rejected the offers of mercy, and feared that those offers might be forever withdrawn.

In the course of the day, through the influences of God's Spirit, a number more indulged a hope in Christ, and were the first fruits of a revival of religion in that place.

Twenty years afterwards, while on a journey, I fell in with a distinguished lawyer, who was present on the occasion to which I have alluded, and learned from him how his own mind had been affected by the transactions of that night. He told me when he heard the notice in the afternoon, it gave him very serious feelings, the subject of religion assumed an unusual importance in his mind, and he began to think it was time to attend to the things which belonged to his peace. In the evening he felt that he was in the presence of God, and was listening to an offer of pardon and eternal life from him. "O, never, never," he exclaimed, "to my dying day, shall I forget that night!"

This is the difficulty in the way of conversions of sinners; they feel that they have to do with their minister, instead of transacting business with God—that they are listening to a sermon from their minister, instead of attending to a message from the Almighty. They often give themselves credit for having done well while they were rejecting offered mercy, and virtually trampling under their feet the crucified body of their Lord, and accounting the blood of the covenant an unholy thing.

Be entreated, impenitent reader, to consider your responsibility. Every time you hear the gospel, God is beseeching you, by your minister, to be reconciled to him, and every time that you go away from the house of God without embracing the Saviour, a record will be made in that book out of which you must be judged, that you have rejected him again. O, how many times, "Christ rejected" is already standing opposite to your names in that book! [N. Y. Evangelist.

PREREQUISITES OF COMMUNION.

The Rev. Mr. Wills, an English open-communion Baptist, preaching in New York, in a work which he has recently issued, argues against the views commonly prevailing among the Baptists of this country on that subject. The Independent, in noticing his book, says:

"We do not intend to pronounce judgment on the argument between him and his Baptist brethren. The point at issue between him and them is not whether the baptism in Pædobaptist churches may be recognized as sufficient or 'valid' baptism, but whether baptism is always to be insisted on as an indispensable qualification for admission to the Lord's table or to membership in the church. His position is that faith in Christ is the only condition of communion or church-membership, which any society claiming to be a church has a right to demand. We must confess—for ourselves, be it remembered, and for no body else—that unless his position is essentially correct, it would be wrong for Baptists, with their idea of baptism, to admit any to the Lord's table who have not been immersed on the profession of their faith. To the question, 'Whom shall we admit to the Lord's table?'—the close-communion Baptists give precisely the same answer with the great body of those Presbyterians and Congregationalists who are so prone to reproach them with their close-communion. Ask any professor in a Presbyterian theological seminary, Old School or New School—ask any professor in the theological seminaries of New England, whether an unbaptized person may be admitted to communion; and what answer will you get? Put the same question to either of the General Assemblies, or to any General Association; and what answer will you get? Ask who shall be the judge when a candidate presents himself for communion, in whose case it is doubtful whether he has been really baptized? The Presbyterian tells you that the session must judge, with an appeal to the higher courts. The Congregationalist tells you that the church must judge. And certainly, if baptism as well as faith is an indispensable condition of church-membership, there is the same right to judge of the reality of the baptism that there is to judge of the reality of the faith."

THE CHRISTIAN A REAL GENTLEMAN.

A Jewish traveler on the way to Jericho was overtaken by a gang of highwaymen, who sprang upon him and stripped him of his raiment, wounded him, and left him half dead. Presently a certain priest comes that way "by chance." He looks like a gentleman. But from some urgency in his errand, or from a more probable indifference of feeling, he passes by and leaves the wretched sufferer to groan on unrelieved. Another traveler comes in sight. He is a Levite. He comes up to the spot where the blood is trickling out upon the crimsoned grass. Is that Levite a gentleman? No, he is not even a man—he is lacking in the ordinary feelings of humanity. For without a single word of condolence, that we read of, the heartless hypocrite hurried on his way. But at length that good Samaritan, whose name has become a blessed synonyme for beneficence to this day, comes up. That the Samaritan possessed the real substratum of politeness, a kind heart, we know very well. But he had more. He might have hired some one to go back and fetch the wounded man to the inn, and yet not have been lacking in kind feeling. But the man so hired might have treated the unhappy sufferer rudely and roughly, and so he does not risk it. He takes him up himself. He pours oil into his wounds. He gently lifts the poor Jew upon his own beast, and perhaps walks beside him all the way; and on the morrow, when he leaves the inn, he does not put the money to pay his bill into the wounded man's own hand. That might have touched the sufferer's pride; it was enough to be wounded in his body, without having his feelings wounded too, so the Samaritan very delicately pays the two shillings to the host, and says, "Whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again I will repay thee." Now here was Bible courtesy. Here was a true gentleman. There was kindness of heart, and also kindness of manner. These two things make up Christian politeness. The Princeton President's definition (and Dr. Smith was himself no unhappy illustrator of it) was fully satisfied nearly two thousand years ago by a man who understood that politeness was "kindness of heart kindly expressed."

AN ATTRACTIVE CHRISTIAN.

One may be truly pious and just, and yet fail as a Christian of having the grace that wins. He who aspires to the highest usefulness, will aim to have added to a sound basis of character, that which draws and attracts. The late Dr. Mendenhall, Treasurer of the Southern Baptist Missionary Society, was eminently a man of this type. A sketch of him, in the Charleston Baptist, says:—

Another distinguishing trait in the character of Dr. Mendenhall, was genuine courtesy. It threw an atmosphere around, which made it delightful to be in his company. It prompted him to show a considerate regard to the character and feelings of all with whom he mingled. It gained him friends, even when he was compelled to deny favors solicited at his hands. His manner of declining was such as to satisfy the applicant of his desire to meet his wishes, of his sincere regret that he was unable to do so, and to leave upon the mind an impression of his good will and generosity, more favorable than if he had granted the request in a way so ungracious as to do away the kindness of the accommodation, by the cold and uncomfortable interview with which it was connected. He was a man of great softness of manner, and of the mildest and most tranquil disposition. His countenance seemed never to have been ruffled; it always preserved the same kind and composed aspect—truly indicating the calmness and benignity of his temper. The happy equality of his spirits, his superiority to selfish considerations, and his large benevolence, secured for him an unusual amount of affection and good will.

His hospitality was unbounded. His office, his parlor, his table, were the property of his friends. He never appeared so happy as when entertaining those who were so fortunate as to be his guests. His attention to the little wants and wishes of his friends was remarkable. He did not reserve his kindness for great occasions. And this trait of character was often as apparent in regard to total strangers as to friends. In traveling, he was ever consulting the comfort of his fellow passengers. However humble their circumstances, he was accustomed, with the utmost cheerfulness, to give up his own accomodations, if, by so doing, he contributed to theirs.

Of all the men I have ever had the happiness to know, he was the freest from offending in word; coming, as it would seem, as near as it is possible for human frailty to do, to the idea of the Apostle James' "perfect man." The law of kindness was ever on his tongue. He loved his fellow men too well to betray or to speak evil of any. His active mind left him no leisure for trifling, and the benevolent objects he so steadily pursued, no disposition to mingle with the details of slander, or the privacies of domestic life.

A GOOD WORK EFFECTED.

We insert below an address of a converted native of one of the Sandwich Islands, who was about to leave his home, in company with others, to publish the gospel to the heathen of neighboring islands. It was delivered in the presence of a large congregation. How sublime the spectacle furnished by the history of this native evangelist, as given in his own simple words!

"A few of us are about to leave these islands, to carry the word of God to other islands now covered with darkness and idolatry. It is, therefore, proper for me to speak my feelings to you on this occasion.

I am a native of these islands. My parents were idolaters, and I was born in times of darkness. A short time ago all our people were heathen; they worshipped a great variety of gods; they were engaged in war; they were addicted to stealing and robbery. Man and wife did not live together and eat together as now; they took no care of their children. The chiefs were oppressive, and the people degraded.

But a great light has arisen over us. It is the light of this Holy Book. This has been the great cause of our reformation. The Bible has driven away our darkness, overturned our heathenish customs, and caused a great improvement in our condition. Because the word of God has been given us in our own language, we have learned to read, and all the people have learned to read it, old and young. It has been scattered all over the land, and taught all the people to do right. Therefore the people live peaceably; parents take some care of their children; the Sabbath is observed, the laws are regarded, and all dwell securely. It is because a large proportion of our people have turned to the word of God, on all the islands. A great many of our people pray to God and love him. The word of God has been the source of our choicest blessings. What, then, is more reasonable than that we Hawaiians should extend to other nations in this ocean the blessings of the gospel? Those tribes are now what we were a short time ago, degraded, wretched idolaters. Shall we not have pity on them, as the people of God in the United States have had pity on us? I go to do what I can and return. All cannot engage personally in the work; this but few can do. But those who remain have their part also to perform. They can pray, and they can give of their substance to aid the cause, and thus all do something, and share in the blessings that will follow. Now then, as we go from you, let us be remembered in your prayers; pray that the Lord will go with us, and sustain us, and give us success."

REGENERATION.

Reply to "D. E. M."—See First Page.

The declaration of Scripture, that the natural man is "dead in trespasses and sins," "D. E. M." professes to receive as meaning just what it says, namely, that there is no life in him; life, in this connection, being but another term for holiness. He distinctly avows this to be his belief.

He also says, that regeneration is nothing more than passing from a state of disobedience to one of obedience. When the disobedient becomes obedient, the unregenerate becomes regenerate, and this transmutation constitutes the whole of regeneration."

Again he says, "As every intelligent act put forth by a moral agent is either obedience or disobedience, every act involves holiness or unholiness. Where does this holiness reside? All agree, that moral character resides alone in the intention, choice, or willing."

Upon these propositions, which appear very consistent to him, no doubt, our commentary is as follows: The act of the creature, in passing from disobedience to obedience, is "an intelligent act put forth by a moral agent," and therefore "involves holiness." This holiness, as "all agree," "resides in the intention." So then, according to "D. E. M.," we have a natural man, "dead in trespasses and sins"—that is, one in whom there is no holiness at all—putting forth a holy act, and intending to do so—for "all agree that holiness resides in the intention"—by ceasing to be disobedient, and becoming obedient! Now, brother, if this intention is a holy intention, it cannot be the act of the natural or unrenewed man; for in him, as you distinctly admit, there is no holiness. Where is our inconsistency when we say, that this holy intention is the product, or effect, of the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit, and shows that the work has actually been accomplished? In what respect is this "unphilosophical, unscriptural, and most fatal in all its tendencies?"

You say, that "the error [of our syllogism] arises from confounding sin with man's nature," and that "sin is no part of man's nature, no attribute of his being." Did we ever say, that it was an attribute of man's being? Did we ever hint any thing of the kind? If so, when, and where? It is true, we sometimes speak of the unregenerate as a natural man, which to you may seem to imply, that sin is an attribute of his being, or something wrought into the very texture of his soul by creative power. But if there is any thing faulty in the expression, you must invoke the Apostle Paul to amend his words. (See 1 Cor. 2:44.) When we have spoken of the depravity or sinfulness of man's nature, it has always been with reference to this use of the term in Scripture. We do not suppose that God incorporates sin into man's being. As to the manner in which he first becomes sinful, we have but little to say; we do not profess any ability to dive to the bottom of this awfully mysterious subject. We suppose our Saviour to mean what he says, however, when he declares that "that which is born of the flesh is flesh;" also, that the Psalmist did not mean any thing very different, when he said, "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me." In view of such expressions, we suppose it to be perfectly correct to say, that man is by nature a sinful or depraved being. The Apostle testifies that the Ephesians, in their unregenerate state, "were by nature the children of wrath." But how they could be, unless they were by nature sinful, we do not understand.

You virtually charge us with teaching, that "the sinner has no agency in ceasing to do evil and learning to do well; that it is no part of the sinner's work to cease from disobeying or sinning; that it is not the sinner who leaves off unholiness, and puts on holiness," &c. To this charge we reply, that it is altogether a misrepresentation. We teach nothing of the kind, but the direct opposite. But in this, as throughout your whole article, you confound regeneration with conversion. That a man should convert, or turn, himself from his sins, and walk in newness of life, is our constant teaching; nor is our doctrine concerning regeneration responsible for any such monstrosity as that which you attempt to saddle upon us. Regeneration and conversion are not the same. The one is the work of God; the other the act of the creature. One is cause, the other effect. You reverse the order. You might as well argue, that because the Saviour told the lame man to rise up and walk, his act of obedience to the command was what renewed him to soundness, whereas it was only the proof that he was renewed.

Again, you multiply your quotations from Scripture to show that the Holy Spirit, in quickening a dead sinner to life, employs divine truth as the means. You might have spared yourself this labor; we never denied it. We believe that truth is always employed to effect the sinner's resurrection to newness of life. Words were employed, too, when Lazarus was raised from the grave. Lazarus heard the words, and obeyed them. Will you venture to say, that unless he had given attention, and rendered obedience, omnipotence itself could never have performed the change that passed upon him? Now, the sinner is as destitute of holiness, or spiritual life, as Lazarus was of natural life. Nevertheless, it is [illegible] duty to call to him with the words of divine truth, and say, 'Come forth, dead sinner, and walk in newness of life.' You may say, that if it exceed the limits of his own nature to do so, or if it is beyond his power to regenerate himself, it would be absurd to make this call; and so you may say, (as indeed you do,) that such doctrine is "most fatal to the progress of the gospel, because it repudiates the very command to go and preach the gospel." But we feel that it is not absurd, because God has told us to do it; and we are sure that He has power to give life, when we speak what he commands us.

One word in reference to your main position, and we have done. You aver that regeneration is simply a change from disobedience to obedience. Plausible as this may seem, it would be well to think a little before receiving the idea as perfectly orthodox. Nicodemus knew it to be necessary for a sinner to amend his life, as well as any body. That a sinner must cease to do evil, and learn to do well, was no strange idea to him. Now, can it be supposed that our Saviour meant nothing more than this in the remarkable conversation he held with that man of the Pharisees, on the necessity of being born again? Did he urge upon Nicodemus what he already knew to be necessary, and then charge him with ignorance, merely because he had never heard of it under that name? The very thought is inadmissible, and before "D. E. M." preaches any more sermons on this subject, we hope he will re-examine his ground. Regeneration is more than a mere change from obedience to disobedience. Read a piece in last week's Recorder, entitled "The Physician Healed;" ponder the lesson which it teaches. How careful was that clergyman to obey God! How he fasted and prayed! How he strove to render himself holy, and to secure the favor of God! Alas! he knew not that he must be born again. Through the riches of divine grace, however, he was afterwards made a subject of the New Birth. Yet it does not appear that he was any more obedient then than before. Nevertheless, he found that enjoyment in God, that love, that peace, that soul-satisfying view of divine things, which, but for the change wrought in his heart by the Holy Spirit, he never could have found. Yet D. E. M.'s doctrine is calculated to build up such self-deceived persons, and to keep them in profound ignorance of the unsearchable riches of Christ. We pray that he may learn the way of the Lord more perfectly.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday Movements—Jewish Disabilities—Canada Clergy Reserves—Romish Education.

GLASGOW, April 22, 1853.

Last week, a public meeting was held in London, at the Vestry Room, King's Road, St. Pancras, relative to the Sunday opening of the Crystal Palace—Mr. J. Flather, Churchwarden, in the chair. Resolutions were unanimously carried, pledging the meeting to petition Parliament in favor of its being so opened, as "a great adult educational establishment"—"mental, moral, and physical." Mr. J. Pettie complained "of an unfair mode of proceeding" in getting up the opposing petitions. Some of these, he said, he had seen, purporting to be from working men, in which "not more than one name in 500 attached was that of a working man." In the Eastern suburbs of Glasgow, a Meeting was this week held, in furtherance of the movements to prevent the Palace being opened. It was a Working Man's Meeting; but the chief speaker seems to have been the Rev. Dr. William Symington, who, as usual in such cases, assumed that the Fourth Commandment sanctified Sunday, and thence argued the sin and danger of its violation. There is, in such a mode of dealing with a sacred subject, a sad want of that practical influence which true religion ought to have, in leading men to deal honestly in word as well as in deed. A correspondent of the Scottish Guardian of to-day, intimates that there is much Sunday desecration among the salmon fishers, in cleaning and preparing their nets; and even, when parties desire to have the fish at dinner, taking the salmon from the net. He likewise talks of this as a violation of the Fourth Commandment, as if he really believed it had something about Sunday sanctification among the duties which it inculcates.

The third reading of Lord John Russell's Jewish Disabilities Bill, passed the House of Commons, this day week, by a majority of 288 against 230. The majority is larger than was generally expected; but whether it will pass into a law, it remains with the House of Lords now to determine. They have negatived it before, and may again.

As directly bearing on religion, we likewise notice of the Canada Clergy Reserves Bill—the fate of which, also, in the Lords, is dubious. The majority in this case was greater, 288 against 208. In the opinion of many, if it be not passed, the result, sooner or later, will be that the Canadians, rejecting British rule, would seek a union with the States. Its passing, however, will prove a sad blow to the Protestant Episcopal and even to the Presbyterian Church temporalities—for that the Canadian Legislature will do what this measure only puts into their power legally to do, there is every reason to expect. Lord John stated before the night's discussion commenced, that the Law Officers of the Crown had given a verbal opinion, that should these Reserves be secularized by the Canadian Legislature, no payment from the Consolidation Fund could be required by the clergy instead. The result, we trust, may be, to make them act in matters of revelation more independently of civil government, and, instead of striving to maintain traditions in opposition to Scripture, to reject whatever makes void the holy law of God. The contemplated alteration will, we believe, leave the Romish endowments in Lower Canada untouched—which, it is stated, do not fall short of £4,500,000.

In the House of Lords, on Monday last, the Earl of Winchelsea's motion for a Committee to inquire into the system of education pursued at the Irish Romish College of Maynooth, was negatived by a majority of 110 against 53. The Government, which is less favorable to Protestantism than formerly, having in it Sir James Graham, long known by his leanings to Romish doctrines, and Mr. Gladstone, a noted Puseyite—were unwilling to allow the subject to be considered and decided by such a tribunal. Lord Aberdeen, therefore, proposed that the inquiry proposed should be made through a Crown Commission; which was agreed to. This is by no means an equivalent, as the members of Commission will, in this case, be nominated by Government, and consequently chosen with some reference to their known views on the subject. That the Government should be disposed to cloak or palliate the evils of a system which shows no favor to any party which is not disposed to yield them pecuniary and political aid, is indeed remarkable, considering the constant efforts which Popery makes, every where, to bring all under its thraldom, and its hatred to the word of God. John, who miscalls himself Bishop of Tuam in Ireland, in a letter to the Earl of Derby, while Premier, was most wrathful against the "Bible men" and "proselytizers." A Scripture Reader was even fired at, last winter, in Mayo, by a young man who had previously threatened him. And these misguided men, so trained in reference to the word of God, carry out the lesson in matters of a secular character also. Evidence taken seemed clearly to establish that murder is systematically organized in Ireland, and paid for, against parties obnoxious for letting or taking land, even when the preceding occupants paid no rent. The Queen's Colleges, erected in that country on the most liberal principles, have been denounced by Pope and prelates; and when Dr. O'Toole, Vice President of the Galway College, was anxious to retain his situation, and encouraged Romish parents to keep their children there, he was compelled by the Pope, to whom he had appealed in hope of a different deliverance, to resign. Now the emigration from that unhappy country proceeds so rapidly, and seem to esteem it as a favorable opportunity of escaping from priestly thraldom, that their newspaper organs are intimating a necessity for farther Government aid in behalf of the priests left idly behind. They cannot dig; but to beg they have not the grace to be ashamed. Meanwhile, through the work of evangelizing, tardily commenced, many of the Irish have renounced Popery, and even in London, large numbers, comparatively, have done the same.

MISSION OF YOUTHFUL SABBATH-KEEPERS—NO. 5.

That our especial mission, our especial field of contest, is the moral and religious—that our peculiar difficulties and consequent temptations emanate here, from which we may not expect relief, save as the cause of truth succeeds—that the ultimate success of our cause appears certain, hence the two-fold inducement for perseverance, the effect of doing right reverting upon the agent, and its ultimate effect upon the world—we have attempted to show. If these things are so, what manner of persons ought Sabbath-keepers to be? What kind of laborers are needed? What ways and means should be provided? In short, What are the especial and great wants of the denomination?

As the starting, central principle, deep and ardent piety is needed. Individuals possessing living, active religious principles, are wanted as laborers. This is implied from our field. Our work being primarily of a religious nature, there is needed those enjoying frequent communions and a close and careful walk with God, to do it. The mechanic should be well skilled in his trade—the literary man in literature—the farmer in agriculture—the statesman in national affairs—the warrior in the art of death—the physician in the art of healing—the lawyer in law—the teacher in teaching—so, likewise, the religious laborer should be supported, energized and guided by the spirit of his calling—its principles should be fully understood, received and carried out in all of his activities. All laborers that are working out moral and religious truths, must be imbued with the spirit and tendencies of those truths—must be energized, spiritualized by their principles. Our success, as a denomination, is intimately connected with our ardent, self-sacrificing, truth-loving piety. Our great need is for this kind of laborers. Let us notice some of our wants in this respect.

We want ministers. These are the great moral levers used of God, for moving, elevating the moral world. The ministry is the great medium for conveying spiritual truths to mankind. Though they are to be strengthened and upheld by the church, yet the world's evangelization rests primarily upon ministers. They must be the heralds, the standard-bearers in every great spiritual effort. As a denomination, we stand greatly in need of them. We have a noble band, but not enough to meet the demand. Many of our churches are without pastors. They are like sheep without a shepherd. The bread of life is fed to them but scantily, and at irregular intervals, as, perhaps by chance, a pastor, leaving his own flock now and then, visits them. They are asking, they are perishing for the want of spiritual teachers.

We need missionaries. Home missionaries are wanted to scatter Bible truths and establish Bible practices in our own land. Missionaries are also wanted for foreign fields. There are peculiar inducements for us to labor in such fields. The heathen, not being bound by practice or prejudice to either Saturday or Sunday, would, when converted, as readily fall in with Sabbath as with Sunday observances. A Seventh-day Baptist, with the spirit of a Judson, might be the means of adding thousands of converts to our denomination, as he was to his; besides preparing the way for the addition of untold numbers in future years. A man of our denomination labors, on a foreign field, equal handed with a man of any other denomination. With the Jewish nation, we have a decided advantage. Here we find our Sabbath observances in our favor. Hence, while we, in common with other Christians, are to preach the gospel to every creature, yet, as in a special manner, it is a pastor's duty to preach to his own flock, as it is the parent's duty to labor for the conversion of his children, the brother for his sister, the sister for her brother, the child for his parent, and all for those brought by the guiding of Providence more directly under their immediate influence—so, in an especial manner, have we an important mission to the Jews. Our adaptability points to the work. If in their conversion they are to give up their adherence to the Decalogue as an unbroken law, then we as a denomination, evidently, have no very special lot in the matter. To those that have broken that law belong, the more immediate agency of converting them to a like practice. On the other hand, if they are to become Christians, and still honor the whole Decalogue, it is as manifestly not the especial privilege of those that dishonor that law, to be the heaven-ordained instruments in bringing about their conversion; but rather to those that are obedient to the law. This truth, and our consequent responsibility, will ever press themselves upon our consciences, despite all efforts to shake them off. It has long rested as a deep and abiding conviction upon the minds of many of our fathers and mothers in Israel—upon the minds of many of those that most frequently and devoutly supplicate the throne of grace in behalf of a perishing world—of those that contribute of their means for the support of every good work. We may strive to smother this conviction as much as we please; yet if we do our duty, we must sooner or later come to our especial and true work. We may flee to the uttermost parts of the earth, yet a cry will reach our ears from the "children of the prophets"—the Jews, through long and toilsome journeys, will beseech us at our doors to fulfill our mission to them. We seem to be ready for the work in everything save in men and women prepared for the work.

Again, we need authors, agents, colporteurs—in short, all kinds of laborers in the cause of truth and religion—laborers that will cheerfully sacrifice ease and reputation for the sake of conscience. We want nothing so much as men and women devoted to the demands of our benevolent enterprises, that are languishing from a lack of them—to the demands of our churches, that are earnestly calling for them.

From whence are we to obtain them? Evidently not from those that are already engaged in the active warfare. They, already, have their hands and hearts full. Our aged ministers are wearing out—their ranks are being thinned. By whom are these thinning ranks to be filled? From whence are the destitute churches—the mission fields, asking for laborers—the posts requiring consecrated heart and intellect, to be supplied? The supplies, the recruits, must come from those youth that are now upon farms, in work-shops, or, perhaps, in common or higher schools. Youth of sanctified spirits, of deep ardent piety, are those to whom the denomination must look—on them rests its future prosperity, its hope of future success. Those of you, my young friends, that have consecrated yourselves, body and spirit, to the service of God, who are influenced by his Spirit—have demands pressing upon you that are important and solemn, and you must prepare to meet them. It becomes you to study faithfully the scope and tendency of your sphere of action, and prepare to meet it accordingly. You cannot shuffle off the responsibility. Duty must be done, or the consequences suffered. It lies mainly between your consciences and your God, to settle the question as to what part you are to act in the great battle-field of truth—in the church militant.

While the responsibility rests primarily upon the individual, the church is not without responsibility in this matter. If it is her duty to pray to the Lord of the harvest to send forth laborers—if it is, in a measure, her duty to judge of the commission of those presenting themselves as laborers—it seems but legitimate to conclude, that it is also her duty to seek for laborers, as well as to pray for them, and judge of them. Why is it that so many of our churches are without ministers at the present time? The fault, if any, cannot be charged upon God. He never designed it to be thus. It is His good pleasure that the church should be a vital, growing, self-supporting institution—that it should not only supply its own wants, but also the wants of the world. The church that has had an existence for years, and yet has not raised up or sent forth a single minister, may well question her course of action. That pastor who has preached for years to churches, yet has not brought forward a single youth for the gospel ministry, may well ask himself, whether he has faithfully performed his duty. Have such pastors and churches prayed that the Lord would send forth laborers from their midst? Have they not only prayed but sought for such among their number? Has the poor, the obscure, and diffident, yet talented and deeply pious young man, been sought out and encouraged as he needed to be? If pastors have not, it is no matter of surprise, if God does not honor them with successors from their own charge. If churches have not, it will not be strange if they seek elsewhere and find not. Let pastors and churches ask themselves what they can do towards removing the moral dearth that reigns in the vineyard of the Lord. Let the young earnestly inquire what the Lord would have them do.

While deep and ardent piety must be the basis, the central, energizing principle of all Sabbath-keeping laborers, whether they labor as preachers or farmers, missionaries or merchants, colporteurs or mechanics, authors or day-laborers, yet there are other allied qualifications that are necessary—characteristics that spring naturally from piety, as spring the branches from the parent stem. We mention, first, a sincere and ardent love of truth. This arises naturally from a sincere desire to know and do the whole will of God. Our desires, our mission, should not be confined to a solitary truth, or set of truths. All truth is harmonious, springing from the unity of thought and purpose of one eternal and all-wise Being. All truths cluster around and depend upon each other. They cling to a common support—they radiate from a common center. That support and center is God. Hence, we need not expect to exalt a solitary truth or principle, and bring the world do adopt it, while we neglect all others, or wilfully trample them in the dust. We must become earnest seekers and earnest defenders of every moral and religious truth. You that are soon to carry forward the interests of the denomination, should strive to cultivate a sincere, self-sacrificing love of truth, wherever or in whatever form it may be found. It should be an ever present principle, a guiding star, in all of your movements. Wherever it may lead the way, there you are to follow. Your position requires that, for its sake, you will ever be willing to stand with the minority. It requires that you should not be over-desirous of popularity, but should possess that kind of spirit that will enable you to stand opposition, ridicule, obloquy, and persecution. You need that spirit that will not make you the narrow-minded, persecuting sectarian, but the generous, whole-souled, conscientious defenders of every truth. To this end, its sacred fountains should ever be welling up from the deepest recesses of your hearts, gushing out and diffusing itself through all of your acts.

This love of truth is intimately connected with advancement. Every truth that is reduced to practice, gives progress. You are to enter upon your mission, when error, falsehood and truth, right and wrong, good and bad, beauty and deformity, conservatism and reform, are commingled in various systems, organizations, sects, and governments. These conflicting principles are now opposing and jostling each other—struggling for the mastery—and claiming dominion over the human mind, with an unprecedented universality and activity. There is also, a reading, thinking, talking, theorizing, experimenting, and inventing—a preferring the young, the vigorous, and the useful, to the old, the stately, and the ceremonious—unknown in previous ages. There is evil as well as good connected with all this. There is danger of being intoxicated with imaginary progress—danger of being led into extravagancies and humbugs—of being lost amid swamps and darkness, by the uncertain and deceitful lights leading us on. But, on the other hand, it bespeaks much good, showing, as it does, the awakening and disenthrallment of the human mind—its grasping after truth—its longing for a higher and holier destiny, towards which it is approaching.

It becomes you to understand and appreciate the spirit of the age—the present wants, the present progress and tendencies of the world. It will not answer to be left behind in its advancement. You will be required to "let the dead past bury its dead," and become earnest actors in the "living present." "What is written, is written." You cannot change a line or word, in its reference to the past. It is useless to sigh over the follies and miseries of by-gone ages, or to look with longing eyes at their fancied or real glories. They are past, never to return. Each past age had its actors, who performed well or ill their part, leaving their works and influence to descend to future ages. They are responsible for them. Although you cannot affect the ages that have become a part of eternity, yet you can affect, can modify, their influences upon the present and future—can also bring new influences and truths to bear. For this purpose you are to labor—for this purpose you are to study faithfully the experience, the wisdom, the labors and fruits of other days. You are obligated to separate the right from the wrong, the true from the false—to distinguish what tends to progress from what produces immobility or retrogression. You are to prevent, as far as it is in your power, the false, the wrong, from having an influence, while you use the true, the good of the past in forming present and future systems—remodeling and modifying the old so as to suit the onward march of truth and right, in harmony with the eternal laws of God. In doing so, you will have to use the appliances left by those having gone before you, and those furnished by your cotemporaries, or else invent new ones for yourselves. In all of your undertakings, make a careful selection of means and measures—heartily adopting those that tend to progress, and rejecting those that hinder it. Ever stand upon the headlands of advancement, beckoning your fellow man on to a brighter and higher destiny. But in choosing your position, be sure that you stand upon the rock of truth, instead of the quicksands of error. Be slow in forming an opinion, or determining a course of action, and be not too positive in such opinion or determination when formed; but humbly, carefully, perseveringly, carry forward all well matured undertakings, until convinced that they should be given up or changed. Let it ever be your aim to perfect the imperfect, remove error, and establish truth, either by discovering new truths, and reducing them from the abstract to the practical, or by revivifying old truths, that have been thrown aside. Labor to dethrone superstition and infidelity, and enthrone true religion. Strive to advance society—elevate individual man. Labor to perfect organizations, systems, and governments, that tend to the amelioration of humanity.

MACOM.

INQUIRY AND PERSECUTION IN THE HOLY LAND.—The Missionaries of the Church Missionary Society in Palestine, state that the rich convents of the Greek and Romish churches in Palestine, are using their influence to oppress many who are seeking after the pure word of God, and to crush altogether every attempt at scriptural instruction. The convents, being wealthy, have the means of persecuting, and depriving them of subsistence, by ejecting them from their habitations, and from their trades or occupations. The most unscrupulous methods are restored to, with success, to bring the local governors to aid the designs of the persecutors. Men are beaten for the non-payment of taxes they do not owe, and obliged to satisfy the Government on account of dues (to be paid in grain) for land lying waste through their not having the means of cultivating it.

ISRAEL'S HOPES AND PROSPECTS.

The Almighty Disposer of all human events and destinies, is now creating an interest in the affairs of Israel, such as has not been known in any other age of the world, and such as shows, unquestionably, that a glorious scene is opening with respect to that people, that will astonish the nations. A modern writer, treating on the evidence of God's hand in disposing of the affairs of men, after a passing remark on the former history of the Jews, and its different phases, says:—

"The great drama is yet in progress. The prelude and some preliminary scenes have been acted; a long and melancholy interlude has interposed; and now the shadows of coming events cast before them, indicate the termination of Israel's afflictions, and the opening of another scene, more resplendent in promised glory and divine munificence, than any preceding one."

Not a jot nor a title of all the evil spoken of, has failed, up to the present. Their miseries began with their rejection of the Messiah. When they cried, "His blood be on us and our children," they put the cup of divine wrath to their lips, and they have drunk it to the dregs. But a brighter day is dawning, and even now is exhibited a state of advancement which half a century ago could not have been anticipated, in so short a time, by the most sanguine. Every year and every month are the signs rendered more conspicuous, that the time of their deliverance is at hand.

In a former communication, I alluded to the civil rights and privileges that have been awarded them since the year 1806; before which, not a nation of the old world had by any enactments seemed to recognize that Jews had any rights on earth. Since that period most of the civilized nations of the earth have conceded to them many of their rights, and in many nations high civil privileges have been conferred. Their cruel and unexampled oppression having given way, the spirit of fraternity is reciprocated, and they are not only taking a share in the responsibilities of civil society, but they exhibit talent and merit worthy of the brighter days of their history, giving us a pledge, by their example, that when they are masters of their own destinies, they will give a good account of themselves.

The Christian Church generally have exhibited a corresponding sympathy for the Jews, and probably have in a great measure contributed to the present state of things. It has been remarked, that "it is but a few years since the church evinced any distinctive interest in behalf of the Jews. Prayers were offered of old, but they were prayers without charity, and their faith was without works." After the death of the Apostles and their immediate disciples, the poor Jews could say, "No man cares for my soul." But those times have gone by, and the church is beckoning her long exiled predecessors to share in the blessing of their common Father's love; and they begin to move, and much has been done to direct the attention of the Jews to Jerusalem; which, says the same author, "may now again be regarded as the center of the Jewish nation. Any influence exerted here will tell on the whole Jewish world, for here are Jews out of every nation under heaven; and not only this, but the Jewish Rabbis of Jerusalem maintain a constant communication with their brethren in all parts of the world;" and one great and important fact, in connection with missionary efforts, is that the Talmud is fast falling into discredit, and the books of the Old Testament are received by very many as the only book of divine authority.

The sympathy now becoming apparent in behalf of the Jews, has given them to understand, for the first time since the primitive church, that Christianity has a heart to feel, especially for Israel; and thousands have been won by their love already to embrace Christianity, corrupted and adulterated as it comes to them. They as a people, especially the religious, are looking for some important changes with regard to their nation. An important scene, they are sure, is about to open. The present period commences an epoch in their prophetic writings and expectations. They know some change awaits them, and a general interest is felt, and the whole people are awaking as out of the slumber of ages, and are addressing themselves to some new state of things. They, like some other nations, are preparing for reform. Their traditional books, as the Talmud, which has bound them down to superstition, and made Judaism to the Israelites what Romanism is to the Christian church, as I before observed, is fast falling into disrepute, and the way is preparing for the reception of Christianity. A short time since, in the meeting of the London Society, Lord Ashley remarked, "At no time has the horizon been so bright for the Jewish people—at no time prophecy so near its fulfillment. A year ago no imagination was lively enough to conceive one-tenth of what we have heard this day." The result of this is, that thousands, in various countries, are converted to the Christian faith, and no doubt, should pure Christianity be presented, it would greatly facilitate their movements.

GATHERING OF THE JEWS.—Under the head of religious intelligence, in the New York Times, we find the following paragraph: "On Sunday, 6th ult., eight Jews were baptized at the Jews' Episcopal Church, Palestine Place. It is affirmed that a remarkable change is in progress among the Jews in every country, owing to a manuscript being largely circulated by an influential Rabbi, proving from Scripture that the time has come when the Jews must set about making preparations for returning to the land of their fathers. The said manuscript has been printed in Hebrew and English, and a society has been formed to further the movement proposed by the learned Rabbi."

FRENCH CANADIAN MISSION.—It is stated that in North-western Vermont, the converted French Catholics have formed a French Missionary Society, for the purpose of spreading the gospel among their brethren. They have a Board of nine Catholics, to be aided by a committee of seven brethren, who are ministers in Vermont. Great good is anticipated from this movement, for God is opening the hearts of the French Catholics to hear the gospel.

European News.

The Royal Mail Steamer Asia, which sailed from Liverpool April 23d, arrived at New York May 5th.

In the House of Lords, the Earl of Clarendon has stated that a British fleet will be sent to the colonial fishing grounds this summer, to stop the encroachments of American fishermen, and that both Mr. Webster and Everett were ready to negotiate for reciprocal free trade with the Colonies, though no treaty was made by them.

Mrs. Stowe has been received with a great demonstration of enthusiasm by the people of Edinburgh with the municipal authorities at their head.

The notorious Dr. Achilli announces by advertisements in the Christian Times, that he is about to leave England for the United States.

In France, there is nothing of moment, except it be the evidence of what was known before, namely, that the people have no real attachment or respect for Louis Napoleon; when, riding with him to the theater, the Empress is grossly insulted by persons in the crowd along the street.

In Paris, actions for libel, and trials against the press, continue to occupy the Courts of Justice and the Police. Nevertheless, La Presse boldly steps forward with a series of articles against Bonapartism.

In Holland, the Ministry has gone out of office on the question of favoring the establishment of Catholic Bishops in the country; a more rigid Protestant Cabinet succeeds.

From Turkey we have intelligence that a riot has taken place at Constantinople, in which fifteen Christians were killed, and the military were obliged to interfere to restore order.

Horrible Railroad Accident.

Sixth-day, May 6th, witnessed one of the most awful railroad accidents ever known, resulting in the death of between forty-five and fifty persons, and the maiming of nearly as many more. The express train of the New Haven Railroad, consisting of four passenger cars well filled, which left New York at 8 o'clock in the morning, made its regular stop at Norwalk, and then proceeded upon its way. Just beyond that place the road crosses a little inlet of the Sound, by means of a drawbridge. As the train approached—it was running about fifteen miles an hour, not having gained its full speed—the draw stood open, having just been raised to allow the steamboat Pacific to pass through. The usual signals to turn the coming train were displayed, and were seen by many of the passengers. But they were not seen by the engineer, who recklessly drove forward into the gaping abyss, hurling to ruin the train and its freight of precious lives. From the track to the surface of the river was fifteen feet, and the tide was such that the water was twelve feet deep at the time. Two passenger cars took the fearful leap entire, and the third was broken in two upon the brink. They were broken in pieces by the fall, and of their occupants most were either killed by drowning or contusion, or severely wounded, the few that escaped seeming to have been favored by a miracle.

Among the killed were several distinguished physicians, who had been attending a meeting of the American Medical Association in N.Y. The following is a complete list of the dead who had been recognized up to Sunday evening:—

Julia Anderson, aged 4 years.

Ellen S. Bacon, of Boston, Mass.

Dr. Josiah Bartlett, Stratham, N. H.

Eld. Oliver Barr, 53 years. He was formerly Pastor of the Suffolk-st. Christian Church, N. Y.; late Agent of Antioch College, Ohio. His family reside at Aurora, Kane County, Illinois.

Dr. Samuel Beach, Bridgeport, Conn.

Isaac C. Colbath, Richmond, Me.

Mary Carrigan, New York.

Mrs. Desauque, Philadelphia, Pa.

Mrs. D. W. Dimmock, Mansfield, Ct.

Dr. W. D. Dwight, Brooklyn, L. I.

Walter French, Manchester, N. H., formerly Mayor of that city.

Mrs. J. M. Fluent, of Lascaster, Pa. She was married in N. Y. the morning of her death, and had on her bridal robe and jewels.

Ellen Goss, Poughkeepsie.

Dr. John O. Grey, Springfield, Mass. He was 35 years old, and had his life insured for $5000.

Mrs. Ann S. Green, Baltimore.

J. M. Hutchinson, Boston.

Mrs. Hanua, New York.

S. N. Hazzard, Yonkers.

Joseph M. Hill, R. I.

Rev. John H. Luers, Williamsburg, L. I.

Miss Anna B. Lang, Boston.

B. F. Lazier, Dundas, Canada—had $800 about his person.

Miss Merrit, New York.

Miss Mitchell, Hartford, Conn.

David B. Newell, of Newport, N. H. The deceased was a young man, and was returning from Georgia, where he had been residing for a while for the benefit of his health.

W. B. Opedeck, Worcester, Mass.

Mrs. Parker, Woodbury, Conn.

Beverly Parker, Yorkville, N. Y. His daughter, Charlotte E. Parker, was with him at the time of the accident; she fortunately escaped death, though somewhat injured.

Dr. Abel L. Pierson, Salem, Mass.

Susan F. Pomeroy, Stockbridge, Mass.

Mary E. Robbins, Lennox.

Mrs. Jas. H. Robbins.

Nathan Ring, Jr., of Boston. Upon his person was found $645.

Francis W. Sayles, Boston.

Mrs. Dr. Harley, Baltimore.

Emeline Shepherd.

Dr. J. M. Smith, Springfield, Mass.

Sampson Smith, Bellows Falls, Vermont.

Mrs. G. R. Sparks, Pittsfield, Mass.

Robert Steinheimer, New York.

Martin Tane, New York.

Mrs. Martin Tane, wife of the above.

Jacob G. Van Deventer, New York.

Dr. Archibald Welsh, of Hartford, Conn.

The following incidents connected with this calamity are selected from a large number published by the daily papers:—

James Colburn, a man about thirty-five years of age, from Richmond, Me., was, together with his employer, Mr. Ring, and his wife, in the second car. His brother was instantly killed. Colburn broke out one of the windows, and helped Mrs. Ring out, and then got out himself; in the fall he had his right shoulder broken. Mr. Ring also escaped.

Dr. Russell, of Hartford, narrowly escaped with his life. He was in the car which broke in two, and was among those who did not fall into the draw. He owes the preservation of his life, undoubtedly, to an act of kindness on his part, in relinquishing his seat in the forward car to accommodate a sick man. He took his seat in the third car, and when the accident occurred, the man whom he had considerately served was among the killed, with nearly all the rest in the ill-fated car.

Mr. Speer was seated beside Mr. Jonathan Trotter and Mr. James Bishop at the time of the accident. He describes the fact of the cars giving a complete lurch over; and his first idea was to look out when he saw the light. By a tremendous effort he forced his arm through a window, and succeeded in opening the door. He then assisted Mr. Trotter out in a bruised state, and saved Master Pomeroy. Returning again to his noble work, he succeeded in rescuing two or three lads, thus contributing to the preservation of four human lives.

Several of the friends of Dr. Pierson, of Salem, (Mass.,) staying in the Union Place Hotel with him, urged him to remain and take the boat for safety, but he replied, that the cars were more secure. He went and was killed.

A clergyman and his wife had just changed seats with Mr. Colbath, ship carpenter. Mr. C. was killed, and the others escaped.

Rev. Henry D. Moore, of Philadelphia, was sitting in the third passenger car, just where it was broken, so that his feet were almost clear of the floor, and immediately under him was the awful wreck, the struggling, wounded and dead.

Among the acts of heroism which were performed by persons at hand, was that of John Collins, who has been sick for the past year, and unable to work. He was standing on the dock when the accident occurred, and before the last car was over he had plunged into the water. He swam to a boat, and with his knife cut the cord, and it was used to save the lives of several persons. He swam to another boat, cut it loose, and that was also used to rescue passengers. He continued to exert himself until from exhaustion he fainted and was taken to the shore.

Imprisonment of Colored Seamen.

A case of considerable interest to all friends of equal rights, has recently been tried at Charleston, S. C., which will probably result in bringing before the Supreme Court of the United States the question of the constitutionality of the laws of several Southern States for the imprisonment of colored seamen. The facts in the case, and the pleadings upon it, are thus stated:—

Reuben Roberts, a colored man, about 24 years of age, and a native of Nassau, New Providence, cook on board the British schooner Clyde, arrived at Charleston from Baracoa, on the 19th of May, 1852. On that day, Sheriff Yates, of Charleston District, boarded the vessel, arrested the cook, Roberts, and confined him in jail, where he was kept till the vessel was ready for sea. The Clyde was cleared for Baracoa on the 26th May, on which day Roberts was replaced on board by the Sheriff, making the period of detention and imprisonment eight days, and for this his suit was brought, in the form of an action in trespass for assault, battery, and false imprisonment, and the exaction from him of the large sum of $9 71 as fees for the said arrest and imprisonment, the damages being laid at $4,000.

The case came up on the 21st ult., before Judge Gilchrist, and was argued by Attorney-General Hayne for the defendant Yates, and by Messrs. Pettigru and King for the plaintiff. Mr. Hayne pleaded a long series of acts of the Charleston Legislature, and also the Act of Congress, approved Feb. 28, 1803. "The first section of this Act of Congress prohibits the entrance of any such free negro into any State whose laws forbid such entry; the second section subjects the Captain of such vessel, on board of which such negro may enter such State, contrary to the laws thereof, to a penalty of $1,000; and the third section of said Act of Congress declares that the officers of the United States in the several States shall be governed by the laws of the State prohibiting the admission of negroes or free persons of color. And the said officers are further enjoined by said act vigilantly to carry into effect the said laws of the States; any law of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding."

The counsel for the plaintiff rested their case upon the Commercial Convention of 1815, between the United States and Great Britain, and the acts of Congress, together with the proclamation of Gen. Jackson, founded upon them, which regulates the commercial intercourse between the two nations. Thus any points which might bear directly upon the case of a citizen of New York, are carefully shunned.

Judge Gilchrist sustained the S. C. Laws, and the Jury, under his ruling, exculpated Yates.

An appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States has been taken; and it now remains to be seen, whether that Court, consisting of five Southern and four Northern members, will sustain the Judge of the South Carolina District or not. Whatever the result may be, the mere fact of a possibility that the Negro Laws may come before the Supreme Court, even in the case of a British subject, is exciting no little feeling at Charleston.

Banquet to John P. Hale.—A Complimentary Banquet to Hon. John P. Hale, was given at Boston on the afternoon and evening of May 5. Sixteen hundred people sat down to it, of whom about three hundred were ladies. Among the speakers were Hon. J. P. Hale, Cassius M. Clay, Charles Francis Adams, Judge Jay of New York, Horace Mann, Amos Tuck of New Hampshire, Gen. Henry Wilson, and J. G. Palfrey. Mr. Hale expressed his gratitude for the honor done him. He then proceeded with an extended speech, full of hope and encouragement to the Free Soil party; and concluded by appealing to his hearers to give their most earnest efforts to the cause of freedom; it was a cause that, cherished by a man during his life, would expand his soul and enoble his existence, and that would cheer his death-bed with the reflection that he had not lived in vain, since he had contributed something toward the elevation and happiness of an oppressed race.

Effects of Reading "Uncle Tom's Cabin."—An Indiana paper tells of a slave in Boone Co., Ky., who had learned to read, and had succeeded in obtaining possession of a copy of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," which he read by stealth to his fellow slaves. The glowing pictures given of the sympathy and aid received by George and Eliza, in their escape from Kentucky to Canada, so operated on their imaginations, that twenty-five of them ran off on the evening of the 2d of April, and, so far as we have heard, have not been recaptured. What is supposed to add to the baseness of the act on the part of several of these runaways is, that they were the property of a minister of the gospel!

So much for the effect upon slaves of reading Uncle Tom's Cabin. The following extract from a letter to the National Era, dated St. Louis, March 15, shows that upon freemen also that wonderful book sometimes has great influence:—

"H. D. Bacon, Esq., the eminent banker of this city, and one of the most distinguished citizens of the West, both for his liberality and enterprise, as well as for giving freely of his riches to build churches and endow colleges, had a favorite female slave, who, with her child, were the only slaves he owned, and which for some years he had left entirely uncontrolled. The woman was married to a free man of color, both being pious Christians, and, with her husband, she was careless to procure free papers, which it was expected she should get any time, when solicited. After reading 'Uncle Tom,' Mr. Bacon was convinced of the necessity of immediate action, and spoke to the confiding husband and wife of their perilous condition, in case he should die suddenly; wishing, or rather urging, them to procure the required security immediately, that they might be by law, what they now were only by his consent, free—all of which has been satisfactorily arranged, agreeably to both parties."

Statistics of Colonization.—The following statistics are interesting in themselves, and suggest some interesting inquiries. How long would it take, under the colonization system as at present administered, to remove all of the free blacks?—how long to remove the three millions of slaves?

The American Colonization Society and its auxiliaries have sent out to Liberia, since 1820, in their various expeditions, 7,457 persons. Of these, 3,123 were born free, 242 purchased their freedom, and 4,092 were emancipated in view of their emigration. Twelve were taken from Massachusetts, 32 from Rhode Island, 33 from Connecticut, 142 from New York, 23 from New Jersey, 133 from Pennsylvania, 5 from Delaware, 490 from Maryland, 104 from District of Columbia, 2,586 from Virginia, 1,032 from North Carolina, 408 from South Carolina, 733 from Georgia, 86 from Alabama, 518 from Mississippi, 262 from Louisiana, 331 from Tennessee, 334 from Kentucky, 46 from Ohio, 31 from Indiana, 34 from Illinois, 48 from Missouri, 1 from Michigan, 3 from Iowa, 21 from Texas, 4 from Choctaw Nation, and 5 from Cherokee Nation.

New England Methodists on Slavery.—The New England Methodist Conference held a session at Ipswich, Mass., last week, at which the following resolutions were passed, after considerable discussion:—

1. That as a Conference we are as fully and deeply convinced as ever, that all voluntary slaveholding, or the holding of slaves in bondage for the sake of gain, under any circumstances, is a flagrant sin against God and humanity.

2. That it is our deliberate and settled opinion, that no more persons guilty of the sin of slaveholding should be admitted as members into our Church.

3. That we are fully persuaded, that if a proper discipline were duly administered, or if the spirit even of our present discipline were fully carried out, all voluntary slaveholders would soon be either brought to repentance and reformation of life, or for the sin of slaveholding be expelled from the church.

4. That as there is a difference of opinion as to whether our discipline, as it now reads, would exclude such persons from our communion, it is the sense of this conference, that the discipline should be so altered and amended as to include a well-defined and clearly-expressed rule, prohibiting their reception into the communion of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Death of a Good Man.—Robert G. Shaw, one of the oldest and most esteemed merchants of Boston, died in that city on the 4th inst. A daily paper says of him:—

"During a long and active life, Mr. Shaw has been a most liberal benefactor to numerous institutions of learning and philanthropy. His time and money have been freely given to all objects of public interest which met his approval. For half a century he was constantly engaged in works of kindness and benevolence, and during that period it is estimated his contributions in aid of objects of public and private charity have amounted to the large sum of four hundred thousand dollars. During his last illness, he often remarked, that he was richer for his charities, and he took great pleasure in the recollection of these acts of his life. Since he has been confined to his house, he sent for the President of the Mercantile Library Association, and subscribed the sum of $1,000 in aid of the new hall for that society."

Bells.—Few persons have an idea of the extent to which the manufacture of bells is carried on in the United States. We were under the impresssion that the amount of trade done therein must of necessity be very limited; but in this we were mistaken, as we have lately been credibly informed, that in the foundry of A. Meneely's Sons, West Troy, N. Y., there have within the last year been cast and sold 500 bells; and the demand therefor is so much on the increase as to compel them to considerably enlarge their works. Messrs. Meenely cast on an entirely new principle; but as we are not thoroughly conversant with the mysteries of their craft, we will not attempt to describe where the difference lies. The extensive patronage they receive bespeaks the favorable opinion entertained for those of their manufacture. In almost every part of the civilized world may the chimes of Meneely's bells be heard. Within a short period they have filled orders to China, St. Helena, Cuba, Jamaica, California, and Oregon, besides several to Canada, and almost every State in the Union. They are now making to order a peal of ten bells for a new Episcopal Church in Savannah, Ga., and one of six bells for the Church of the Holy Cross at Troy. By reference to our advertising columns, we perceive that the Messrs. Meneely, besides church, factory, steamboat, and locomotive bells, are also engaged in the manufacture of every description of mathematical instruments, as well as brass and composition castings, of all sizes and patterns, to order. California News.—California news to April 9, one week later, was received in New York May 8th. A weekly line of steamers is to run from San Francisco to Panama for the future, of which this is the first trip. The news presents no event of striking importance. A statement of the passengers by the ill-fated Independence, strongly inculpating Capt. Sampson, has been published. Captain S. has been apprehended on the charge of manslaughter, and waving a preliminary examination, is held for trial. Accounts from the Mines are of a favorable character. The shipment of treasure by the steamer of April 16, it was anticipated, would be unusually large.

"The Under-Ground Railroad."—The following is from the Detroit Tribune of April 19, and shows a state of things which must be alarming to slave-holders:—

"The under-ground railroad is in active operation, running its train regularly nearly every night. About 3 o'clock this morning a train arrived here with 28 goods and chattels in the shape of men, women and children. It not being safe for them to remain in the city until daylight, in consequence of the great rewards offered for their capture, (about $9,500,) means were taken at once to place them in safety in the free land of Canada. They were fugitives from slavery from the chivalric State of Kentucky. It is needless to say, perhaps, that the down trains of this road always go empty."

Instability of the Pastoral Office.—If the following paragraph, copied from the Belfast Journal, is true, the pastoral office is more changeable and less reliable than the proverbially-fickle political offices:—

"Out of 190 Baptist ministers in Massachusetts, during the four years ending April 1, 1852, 170 changed places, and 6 died, leaving but 14 stationary. This fact does not speak very favorably for either party. A few years ago, ministers when settled were established for life; now they are dismissed and changed to suit the caprices of their parishioners."

SUMMARY.

At a late sitting of the Austin Academy of Science at Vienna, Herr Von Auer read a paper upon a newly-discovered process of printing, from all sorts of objects, with comparatively plain surfaces. Among the articles mentioned, which have been copied by the new process, are plants, some of them in flower, embroidery, etched agate, insects, fish-scales, &c. The speaker called this "Naturselbstdruck"—printing from Nature—and said that this discovery forms a new era in the pictorial illustration of works on science and art. The objects copied were given with singular fidelity to the originals. No hint was given as to the process.

His Imperial Majesty Faustin I., the Emperor of Hayti, has sent for Exhibition at the World's Fair, N. Y., the following articles:—Eight bags of Coffee, 2 bags of Chocolate Nuts, 1 pkg. yellow Wax, 1 case of Water Pots, 1 do. Sundries, 2 boxes Soap, 2 pieces Lignum Vitæ, 1 pkg. Starch, 1 do. Mineral Coal, 1 bundle Rosewood Bark, 3 pieces Fustic, 1 bundle Brazil Wood, 1 do Logwood, 1 pkg. Silkwood Bark, 1 do. Pepperwood Bark, 9 Chairs, 1 bale Hayti Hemp, 1 can Castor Oil, 1 do. Honey, 1 block Marble, 1 piece of Mahogany, weighing nearly 3 tuns.

The Nashville Whig says that on Tuesday, the 26th ult., the dwelling house of G. W. Waggoner, who resides upon White's Creek, about seven miles from Nashville, caught fire from the kitchen, and before the inmates could be aroused, was enveloped in flames. Mr. Waggoner had a family of five children, three of whom, including the eldest daughter, about thirteen years of age, were burned to death. The wife of Mr. W. also, in her frantic attempt to rescue her children from the flames, was severely burned.

The alternate sections reserved by the government out of the grant of lands to the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, will shortly be offered at public sale, with a minimum limit of $2 50 per acre. The first reconnoisance has been made of the proposed route, and the nature of the soil has been fully ascertained. The portion of the State (Missouri) through which this road will be built, abounds in all the elements of agricultural and mineral wealth, and its manufacturing advantages are unsurpassed.

In the town of Essex, a young lady who was a Spiritual Rappings medium, suddenly became so wildly deranged, on the 25th ult., as to require constant restraint, night and day. The mania prevails to an alarming extent in that place. Nightly performances are kept up by the circle, at which frantic scenes are enacted. Two of the principal mediums, however, have recently renouuced the faith, and pronounced the idea of communication with the spirits of the departed an illusion.

With a few local exceptions, the papers throughout the great West speak of the growing grain crops as being in the most promising condition, and giving token of an abundant harvest. We have never seen or heard of fewer complaints on this score in any previous season. The Ohio, Indiana, Michigan and Wisconsin papers all concur in saying that present indications warrant high expectations of the coming crop.

The sum of $43 has been collected within three weeks, in three of the Boston schools, for the Washington monument—the contributions placed in the boxes for the purpose, by the pupils. Similar boxes are to be placed in all the grammar schools of that city.

The gross earnings of the Erie Railroad Company for the month of April, 1853, amounted to $423,076 56, against $320,822 95 for the same month in 1852, showing an increase of $102,253 61—equal to about thirty-three per cent.

A dispatch dated Philadelphia, Tuesday, May 3, 1853, says: Hon. John Bannister Gibson, Judge of the Supreme Court, and for many years Chief Justice of the State, died at 2 o'clock this morning, at the United States Hotel, in this City, where for several days his afflicted family have been awaiting in agonizing suspense the termination of his honored life. His disease was an affection of the stomach, which completely baffled the best medical treatment.

MARRIED,

In Verona, N. Y., May 1st, by Eld. C. Chester, Mr. Charles Avery, of Rome, to Miss Clara Ann Williams, of Verona.

In Sangersfield, Oneida Co., N. Y., April 30th, by Eld. Joshua Clarke, Mr. Addison Brightman, of Brookfield, N. Y., to Miss Clarissa P. Clarke, of the former place.

In Cussewago, Pa., on 23d April, 1853, by Eld. A. A. F. Randolph, Mr. William Hays to Miss Harriet Lake.

DIED,

At his residence in Walworth, Wis., on Sixth-day, April 15th, of chronic abscess, after a painful illness of eleven weeks, Dr. Henry Clarke, in the sixtieth year of his age.

The subject of this notice was born at Hopkinton, R. I., in the year 1793; commenced the practice of medicine in Otsego County, N. Y., in 1813; entered the army of the United States as surgeon's mate in 1814, remaining in the service until the close of the war, when he settled in Plainfield, N. Y., in the practice of his profession. He was a member of the N. Y. Legislature in 1830, and was mainly instrumental, in connection with a member from New York City, in securing the repeal of the act imprisoning for debt. In 1836 he removed to Chicago, Ill., and in 1840 settled on Big Foot Prairie, now Walworth, Wis. He was a member of the Territorial Council in 1846 and '47.

Dr. Clarke possessed a very superior intellect. He had a vigorous, truthful, and well-balanced mind. He was ambitious to excel in all he undertook, especially in his noble profession, at the head of which he stood, to which he was strongly wedded, and for the honor of which he would make any personal sacrifice. His reading was extensive and varied. His mind was well stored with useful intelligence, which he was ever ready to impart, and never failed to interest and instruct those around him. Friendship was with him something more than a name. He was generous to a fault—kind, courteous, and gentlemanly to all—and was in fact a true man.

His funeral was attended by the largest concourse of people that ever assembled on a similar occasion in Walworth County; indeed, almost every individual in the community considered his death a personal bereavement. Sad indeed were the countenances of all, as they gazed for the last time upon the cold though placid features of their venerable and truly venerated friend. Sermon by Eld. O. P. Hull, from Ps. 27: 10. He has left a fond companion, and a large family of children, to whom his loss is truly irreparable. But to the heart more stricken and crushed than the rest, he has left a beautiful memento, his last visible effort (some five minutes before he expired) being to caress her.

Dr. Clarke made a profession of religion in early life, and attached himself to the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, and recently united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Walworth. He was associated with Elds. W. B. Maxson and Eli S. Bailey in editing the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Magazine, and in compiling the Hymn Book first published by the denomination—of one favorite hymn in which, commencing, "This is the day which God has blest," he was the author. He died with a blessed assurance of immortality and eternal life, repeating, a short time before his death, the beautiful lines of Dr. Watts—

"Jesus can make a dying bed
Feel soft as downy pillows are,
While on his breast I lean my head,
And breathe my life out sweetly there."

O. P. H.

At Potter's Hill, R. I., on the 3d inst., of pulmonary consumption, Miss Hannah Almy Babcock, in the 34th year of her age. The subject of this notice embraced religion in early life, and united with the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, which enjoyed the privilege of retaining her in membership until the Saviour called her to higher joys in heaven. As years advanced, she became more and more consecrated to the work of the Christian, ever seeking to elevate society in intelligence and piety. It was her pleasure to participate in the benevolent operations of the denomination, and she was one of the number who early enlisted in the good work of Sabbath-School instruction, and she rejoiced to see a large number of children and youth, who had come under her influence, brought to Christ before her death, who will doubtless rise up in the great day of rewards, and call her blessed. Her sickness was lingering, yet borne with Christian fortitude. In her last hours was seen the confirmation of the great principle, that the only safe way to find death disarmed of its terrors, is to serve God early, and with a noble and persevering principle. "In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he will direct thy paths."

C. M. L.

At Yreka, California, Dec. 22, 1852, of mountain fever, John G. Moss, aged 28 years and 8 months, leaving a wife and four children living at Buena Vista, Wisconsin. Mr. Moss left home April 18, 1852, and on the 10th of April, 1853, his funeral sermon was preached at his native home, by Rev. Mr. Ward, of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

At Nile, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the morning of Second-day, May 9th, Reuben W. Utter, aged about 39 years. He was a member, and clerk, of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Friendship. Of the circumstances of his death we at present know nothing.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Titsworths & Dunn, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses; Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

Miscellaneous.

A Song of May.

BY WILLIS GAYLORD CLARKE.

The Spring's scented buds all around me are swelling—
There are songs in the stream, there is health in the gale;
A sense of delight in each bosom is dwelling,
As float the pure day-beams o'er mountain and vale;
The desolate reign of Old Winter is broken—
The verdure is fresh upon every tree;
Of Nature's revival the charm, and a token
Of love, oh thou Spirit of Beauty! to thee.

The sun looketh forth from the halls of the morning,
And flushes the clouds that begirt his career;
He welcomes the gladness and glory, returning
To rest on the promise and hope of the year;
He fills with rich light all the balm-breathing flowers—
He mounts to the zenith, and laughs on the wave;
He wakes into music the green forest-bowers,
And gilds the gay plains which the broad rivers lave.

The young bird is out on his delicate pinion—
He timidly sails in the infinite sky;
A greeting to May, and her fairy dominion,
He pours on the west-wind's fragrant sigh;
Around, above, there are peace and pleasure—
The woodlands are singing—the heaven is bright;
The fields are unfolding their emerald treasure,
And man's genial spirit is soaring in light.

Alas, for my weary and care-haunted bosom!
The spells of the spring-time arouse it no more;
The song in the wild-wood—the sheen of the blossom—
The fresh-welling fountain—their magic is o'er!
When I list to the streams—when I look on the flowers,
They tell of the Past, with so mournful a tone,
That I call up the throngs of my long-vanished hours,
And sigh that their transports are over and gone.

From the wide-spreading earth—from the limitless heaven.
There have vanished an eloquent glory and gleam;
To my veil'd mind no more is the influence given,
Which coloreth life with the hues of a dream;
The bloom-purpled landscape its loveliness keepeth—
I deem that a light, as of old, gilds the wave;
But the eye of my spirit in heaviness sleepeth,
Or sees but my youth, and the visions it gave.

Yet it is not that age on my years hath descended—
'Tis not that its snow-wreaths encircle my brow;
But the newness and sweetness of Being are ended—
I feel not their love-kindling witchery now!
The shadows of Death o'er my path have been sweeping—
There are those who have loved me, debarred from the day;
The green turf is bright, where in peace they are sleeping,
And on wings of remembrance my soul is away.

It is shut to the glow of this present existence—
It hears, from the Past, a funeral strain;
And it eagerly turns to the high-seeming distance,
Where the lost blooms of earth will be garnered again;
Where no mildew the soft, damask-rose cheek shall nourish;
Where Grief bears no longer the poisonous sting;
Where pitiless Death no dark scepter can flourish,
Or stain with his blight the luxuriant spring.

It is thus that the hopes which to others are given
Fall cold on my heart in this rich month of May;
I hear the clear anthems that ring through the heaven;
I drink the bland airs that enlived the day;
And if gentle Nature, her festival keeping,
Delights not my bosom, ah! do not condemn;
O'er the lost and the lovely my spirit is weeping,
For my heart's fondest raptures are buried with them!

Fish of Massachusetts Waters.

This subject was recently discussed by the Boston Society of Natural History, the following report of which we copy from the Traveler:—

The President called the attention of the Society to a subject of much importance, the introduction of foreign fish into our waters. Several species highly prized in Europe, such as the Turbot and the Sole, might be brought over and become very valuable articles of trade. In France the experiment had been tried, of raising salt water species in the fresh water lakes of the interior, with complete success.

Dr. Gould stated that European specimens of Limnæ and fresh water shells from Cuba are sure to die if the water is changed in bringing them to this country. Indeed it is extremely difficult to bring them under any circumstances, as the vapor of salt water seems to be fatal to them. This fact would furnish an argument, if one were needed, against the identity of species apparently the same, in these different quarters of the world.

Mr. Ayers remarked that Esox Nobilior fifteen years ago were introduced in a pond eight miles west of Bellows Falls. Since then the embankment of the pond has been broken through, allowing the fish to escape into the Connecticut, where they are now quite numerous in the still water at the foot of Bellows Falls. They have gradually made their way down the river to within fifty miles of Long Island Sound.

Mr. Bouve stated that the town of Pembroke had heretofore enjoyed a considerable revenue from the Herrings which annually visited certain ponds within its territory. At a particular season they were taken in great numbers in seines and distributed to the citizens under the supervision of officers legally appointed. Owing to a difference which had arisen between the inhabitants and those of the towns between them and the sea, the latter had determined on exterminating these fish by intercepting them on their way up. The work had been commenced the past year, and there was every prospect of its being completely successful, so that this valuable fishery was in danger of being entirely cut off.

Mr. H. R. Storer spoke of the serious injury the coast fishing had sustained from the incursion of the Blue fish. It was well known that within a few years this species had made its appearance in Massachusetts Bay, and all along the shores of the State it has seriously interfered with the fishing interests, by driving off valuable species which have heretofore been taken in great numbers; while the Blue fish itself is comparatively worthless. The early catch of Mackerel at Provincetown, which heretofore had furnished active employment to many fishermen, is now almost entirely stopped by the presence of these voracious marauders. It was even said the Cod and Haddock had become much less abundant since their arrival. Mr. Storer suggested that it might be expedient to memorialize the Legislature on the subject, so that, by the offer of a bounty, fishermen might be induced to make active exertions to exterminate such an injurious race.

Mr. Storer said there were fish in the waters of Massachusetts of great value, which were not appreciated as they deserved to be. In Europe such species would be sought for with eagerness, even such despised species as the Skate would not be overlooked.

Mr. Ayers coincided in opinion with Mr. Storer. He thought the State of Massachusetts was annually the loser, by thousands of dollars, through an unfounded prejudice against certain fish. The Blue fish, which are not eaten here, sell readily in New York. The Pollock, which is almost always thrown away by Massachusetts fishermen, is much prized in neighboring States. Since Dr. Storer's Report on the Fishes of Massachusetts was published, one is occasionally sold in the market at an insignificant price. He had himself seen in Connecticut a Pollock on the table, which might have been bought in Boston market for four or five cents for the whole fish, which had been bought there for six cents a pound—the whole fish weighing seven or eight pounds. He regarded it as a very valuable fish, from the use of which the people of Massachusetts are entirely debarred by an unfounded prejudice. In Connecticut it goes by the name of Sea Salmon.

Mr. Storer remarked that this species is one of the most important in the fisheries of the British Provinces. He incidentally alluded to the wrongs the inhabitants of the Provinces had received at the hands of the American fishermen, some of which had come under his own observation. While on a visit to the Gut of Canso and the neighboring waters, the past summer, for purposes of natural history, he had seen those waters crowded with American fishermen pursuing their avocation close in shore. It was not an uncommon thing, he said, for the fishermen to fasten scythes to the bottoms of their boats and row at night among the nets of the inhabitants, thus destroying the principal means of subsistance of many a poor man. The outrages which they perpetrated on shore also were neither few nor slight. He was not at all astonished at the bitter feeling of hostility which had arisen from such treatment.

In accordance with the suggestion of the President, it was finally voted, that a committee of three be appointed to take into consideration the subject of the preservation and economic value of our own fish, and the introduction of foreign species into our waters. Mr. W. O. Ayres, Dr. D. H. Storer, and Mr. H. R. Storer, were chosen a committee for this purpose.

Training Steers.

The following mode of transforming the wild and unmanageable steer into the gentle and well-trained ox, is both reasonable and instructive. We extract from the Country Gentleman:—

The first point is to make them tame and and gentle. This may be accomplished by feeding them out of the hand, and carding them daily. They should be approached gently, without yelling at them until they are frightened out of their wits. After having reduced them to a state of perfect docility, a good yoke should be procured, suitable to their size and strength. A small pen is necessary to put on the yoke; approach gently with the yoke, patting, and speaking gently to them until you have the yoke on the off steer; then let an assistant drive the other under the yoke. Their tails should then be securely fastened, to prevent their getting the habit of turning the yoke. They should be yoked in the morning, and unyoked at night—in this manner, for several days, until they become accustomed to the yoke.

The first thing to teach them, is to stop at the word of command. This may be done by striking them across the face; the blows should be repeated until they stop, and then discontinued; by striking them for every non-observance of the word of command, they will soon learn that by stopping they will avoid it, and will act accordingly. They may be taught then to "gee" and "haw," by gently pushing them around. Backing may be taught by beginning with an empty cart on a side hill; then on a level; then with an increasing load until they will back nearly the same load they will draw. They should never be put to a load that they cannot readily draw, or drilled by prolonged exercise beyond the period when it becomes irksome. Loud and repeated yelling, or the use of the lash, is both cruel and useless. Clear and intelligible, yet low and gentle words, are all that is necessary to guide a well-trained ox. The ox understands a moderate tone more perfectly than a boisterous one, as all sounds become indistinct as they increase. A command should never be given unless enforced. Many bear with bad tricks for a long time, without even an expression intelligible to them—but, when patience departs, a thorough storm of blows is poured upon them. This is the way to ruin every beast; a single blow should be given for each offense.

Taking a Newspaper.

There are now published in the United States about Four Thousand Periodicals, of which we estimate that Three Thousand are mainly devoted to Politics, Miscellany and General News; the rest more especially to Literature, Education, Religion, &c. Probably Five Hundred of the Newspapers are now published Daily, as many more oftener than once a week, and the remainder Weekly. Probably the Weekly issue of Newspapers is not less than Ten Millions of copies, and of other periodicals at least Two Millions more, making a total of Twelve Millions of periodicals weekly, or about two copies for every family in the Union.

But these issues are very unequally distributed. New England's proportion of them is largest; that of New York and Ohio next; after these rank the Free Western States; then Pennsylvania and New Jersey; lastly, the Slave States, which have nearly One Million families precluded by law from learning to read, and of course neither enabled nor inclined to take any periodical whatever. The almost inevitable lack of Common Schools in those States, caused by the incompatibility of Slave Culture with that density of free population which is essential to an efficient Common School system, leaves a deplorably large portion of the Free Population to life-long ignorance of letters. There are more natives of Virginia who cannot read to-day than of New York and New England together, and hardly a Southern post-office at which the number of periodicals received bears as large a proportion to the population of its district as at almost every Northern office. Slavery is perpetually, inevitably at war with the intellectual development of the great mass of the Free as well as the Slave population over whom its baleful shadow is thrown.

Throughout the Free States there is more than one periodical taken, in the average, to each family; but some families take a dozen, and a great many none at all. It would probably be near the truth to estimate that one-half the families in the Free States take some sort of periodical. The remainder, including of our immigrants from the Old World, take none at all, and what meager, confused, imperfect notion they gather of the history of the times is obtained by occasionally borrowing a neighbor's journal or running one through in some convenient barroom.

Do not the heads of these destitute families make a grave mistake in neglecting to take a paper? Some few of them, we know, contain no member who can read, and of course could make little use of a paper. Some are absolutely too poor to afford even three or four cents per week for a paper. These are destitute, helpless invalids or poor widows with young children and nothing but the meagre product of the commonest needlework to depend upon. Yet these last must be very few; for the widow who cannot spare or dress her children for school may do much to ease the heaviness of their lot and inform their minds by paying two or three cents occasionally for a good newspaper and have it read to her by one of her little ones as she pursues her work. The poorest household may thus be insensibly transformed into a humble but not inefficient school. And so the poor immigrant, who never learned to read, and must delve through every hour of daylight to earn a mere subsistence, may wisely take a good periodical so soon as he has one child who can read it, while the rest of the family listens and improves. Simply as an impulse to study and a helper to Education, a good Newspaper in a family is worth far more than its cost.

But the farmer, mechanic or artisan who undertakes to do without a newspaper as a matter of economy, can hardly fail to lose ten dollars for every one he saves. If he makes or grows any thing to sell, he needs to be promptly advised of every incident or influence likely to affect for good or evil the cost of the materials he must buy and the products he has or will have to sell. Many a man have saved five dollars by doing without a newspaper and lost hundreds in the sale of his wares, his crop, or his farm, which the newspaper would have saved him. Thus in 1846–7, when Breadstuffs rose in consequence of the Potatoe Rot in Europe, there were many farmers who took no paper because they 'couldn't afford it,' and sold their grain for fifty to a hundred dollars less than it was really worth when and where they sold it, for want of the information which any good paper would have given them. And this case illustrates a general principle.

We believe the day rapidly approaches when the poorest head of the family who can earn day wages will understand that he cannot afford to do without a newspaper—that he cannot without serious loss dispense with the information it imparts and the impulse it gives to the mental development of his children. Cause of the Explosion of Burning Fluids.

The atmosphere, as is well known, contains oxygen gas, in the proportion of one-fifth part, by measure. It is also well known, that if hydrogen gas be mingled with atmospheric air, it becomes explosive when flame is applied. If the hydrogen gas be added in the proportion of two measures to one of oxygen, and especially if the whole quantity be large, the ignited gases will explode with great violence. The same is true if the illuminating gas be substituted for hydrogen gas; but that gas being composed of hydrogen and carbon, requires more oxygen gas. If a drop of ether be agitated in a bottle of oxygen gas, its vapor will instantly mix with the gas, and then a burning candle applied at the mouth of the bottle will cause a loud, and it may be a dangerous explosion.

A glass globe of two quarts capacity which had been rinsed with alcohol, merely shaken in it and then poured out, was placed on the hearth of a Franklin stove to dry, its mouth being towards the fire, but at the distance of three feet from it, when it was soon shattered with a violent and dangerous detonation.

These facts will explain the explosion of the burning fluids now so generally used, and which are composed of oil of turpentine and alcohol. The inflammable vapor which is constantly rising from the fluid when there is any space above, (in other words, if the vessel is not full of the fluid,) becomes mixed with the air and soon makes it explosive, just as if hydrogen gas were mingled with it; on the contact or near approach of flame, an explosion will or may ensue. The flame may be even at some distance, because if the vessel be open the vapor will flow out of it, and being heavier than than the air, it may even reach a candle placed on the floor, and away from the flame, as in the case of the glass globe above. Whenever a lamp containing burning fluid is only partly filled—and the same with the cannister or reservoir—the air above becomes explosive. The state of things occurs constantly in the lamp, as the fluid burns away, and in the can or reservoir as the fluid is, from time to time, poured out for use.

It is so common that the fluids are poured into the lamp and from the can, with a flame near at hand, and perhaps burning in the lamp itself, that we must continue to expect these very distressing casualties, by explosion and burning, because most persons who perform these duties are ignorant of the danger and its cause, and the few who know better, are often rash and presumptuous. The danger may be entirely avoided by the use of the Wire Gauze Protectors, that have been recently introduced. [Silliman.

Don't Trifle with Newspapers.

A case of some importance to newspaper publishers was recently decided in favor of J. Watson Webb, publisher of the New York Courier and Enquirer. It appears that the defendant's clerk took an advertisement to the plaintiff's office, and requested its insertion, in accordance with which it appeared in the paper; but, when the bill for it was presented, the amount was objected to, on the ground that the defendant was not aware that he was to be charged extra for having the advertisement "leaded," or because it was a longer advertisement than one then in the paper, and for which he had contracted at a certain price. The following points in the decision of the Judge we quote, and it will be seen that the law applies equally to subscribers and to advertisers:

The Judge said: "It is urged that, as the defendant took the paper, saw the advertisement, and continued to enjoy the advantage of this advertisement, without making any objection, that he ought to pay for it—that is, if he was aware of its being in the paper, and that it was an extraordinary advertisement, and that he had only a right to 16 lines in the usual way. So, if a man takes a paper by subscription, and should order it to be discontinued, and the editor continues to send it from any misconception, the subscriber is liable on this ground, that he must not receive the paper and get the advantage of reading it without paying for it, unless he takes measures to notify the editor, and have the error corrected. If this advertisement was published in this extraordinary way, and the defendant knew of it, he was bound to tell plaintiff that such a mistake had been made, in order that it might be corrected; and if defendant knew of this, and did not tell of it, he ought to pay for it." The jury retired, and in a few minutes returned into court with a verdict for the plaintiff of $318 89, being the amount claimed, with interest.

Saving Liquid Manure.

The Boston Cultivator has the following valuable information on this important branch of farm economy:—

We have often spoken of the advantage to the farmer of saving the urine of his stock. The substance, though equal in value to the solid excrements, is in many cases totally wasted. Perhaps the readiest and best way of saving that from cattle and horses during the winter season, is to have a cellar under their stalls, where both the liquid and solid portions of the manure are deposited together. By this means nothing need be lost, and if it is desirable to mix any other substances with the manure, it may be very conveniently done; they may be spread over the manure from time to time in just such quantities as are deemed proper.

But there are situations in which the advantages of cellars cannot be readily obtained. Many farmers are obliged to occupy barns already built, and if they are not on the most approved plan, they must be turned to the best practical use. The animal liquids may be mostly saved, even where there is no cellar for the manure. Absorbents—as litter, muck, charcoal dust—may be strewed over the floors of the stalls. But it will be necessary to have the floors tight, or there will be more or less loss.

A mode similar to that just mentioned is adopted by Hon. F. Holbrook, Brattleboro', Vt., whose judicious management and application of manures, has been an important item in his highly successful farming. We had the opportunity, a few days since, of seeing Mr. Holbrook's arrangements for saving manure. He has no cellar; but by proper attention saves all the animal manure, and by a mixture of other articles, considerably increases the aggregate value. The floors of his stables are water tight. A channel is made in the rear of the platform on which the animals stand, and into this a quantity of muck is thrown every day, after the manure made the previous day has been cleaned out. This muck absorbs all the urine, and is gathered with the manure into one mass. In addition to this, the animals are well littered with leaves.

The muck and leaves are collected in the fall, and placed in situations where they can be obtained as required. If the muck freezes, it is not objectionable, as the frost tends to destroy the acids it sometimes contains; it can be easily broken up with a pick, and the barn is made so warm that in the coldest weather the temperature, while the stock is in, is above the freezing point, and the frozen muck, in absorbing the liquid, becomes completely pulverized. The leaves are very good simply as a bedding, and make the very best manure by decomposition.

Cheap Fire Annihilators.

A simple Fire Annihilator, for domestic use, is described in the Troy Budget by an insurance agent of that city. Hear, and save your houses!

"Why will not people avail themselves of modern discoveries to save their property from fire? A package of two or three pounds of sulphur, disposed in such a manner as to be among the first things to burn, or at hand to be thrown into the fire after its commencement, before the air rushes into the building, will arrest it as surely as water, and is better than water when varnishes or resinous gums are burning.

"Oxygen and sulphur have so strong an affinity that in the combustion of sulphur the oxygen of the atmosphere is converted into sulphuric acid gas, at which point fire is arrested.

"I tested this principle and thereby saved my property some years since, an account of which I gave through your columns at the time. It is impossible to conceive how much human suffering might have been averted had that suggestion been attended to by ship and boat-owners. I never read the accounts of the terrible loss of human life on board our ships and steamers without thinking that they might have been saved by a package of brimstone in the fire-room."

Home-grown Madder.—The experiments which have of late been made with home-grown madder, says the Lowell Journal, have proved that, when properly treated, American is equal to the best French-grown madder. Like Turkey, Dutch or Alsace madders, the American requires the addition of a little chalk to produce the best effects. During the past winter, the Merrimack Company have used, with great success, some madder grown in Montague, Franklin County, Mass., and are now about to dye some calico with this Massachusetts madder, to be exhibited at the New York Crystal Palace. Within a few days the Merrimack Company have received a small sample of madder grown in Georgia, which proves to be an excellent article—quite equal to that of Massachusetts. We have been informed that there grows wild in Florida a plant whose root, when eaten by hogs, colors their bones red. Such is the effect of the madder. Doubtless this is an indigenous species, whose cultivation would reward the planter. It is to be hoped that samples of this "Pinkroot," as it is termed in Florida, may be forwarded to Lowell for trial in dyeing. It is very desirable to determine whether it is madder requiring the peculiar treatment of all madders, (except the Avignon,) to produce the fullest, fastest and more brilliant colors.

Singular Explosion.—The chimney of the Freeman office, Salem, Mass., exploded at about 12 o'clock Monday, near the top, and the fragments in falling struck Capt. Poole, of Salem, who chanced to be passing at the time, and felled him to the ground, inflicting two severe cuts upon his head. Capt. Poole fortunately had an umbrella hoisted at the time, which probably prevented a fatal result. The cause of the explosion is supposed to have been from the generation of gas and smoke in the chimney from a quantity of paper and rubbish with which the stove had been filled and had been smouldering for some time, becoming suddenly ignited. The chimney was covered with a flat stone top, which was blown off with a loud report.

A Work of Art.—A Washington correspondent writes to the Norfolk (Va.,) Argus: Clark Mills is a rare genius! His last conception is to make a group of statuary to preserve the stalwart Indian, the monstrous buffalo, the graceful elk, and the fleet wild horse of the prairie, as types of what are fast passing away from our Western country, before the resistless advance of the white man and the school house. He has brought these animals from the Rocky Mountains, and will study them until he gets their counterpart in bronze. It will be eminently proper to embellish some of our public squares with this novel, beautiful and national group. Mills has given such unmistakable evidence of skill, energy, and high genius, in the production of the Jackson Equestrian Statue, that we know he can perfect this last, best idea. He will work at the same time upon the great Statue of Washington, for which Congress has placed at his disposal $50,000.

The Young Prince of Madagascar.—The Queen of Madagascar hates Christianity, and has done all she could to destroy it out of the island. She has not succeeded. The more she has persecuted them that believe on Christ, the more they have multiplied. Among their number is her own son, the heir to the throne. He has lately been called to share in the government with his mother; and one of his first acts was to hinder his poor suffering brethren from being any longer hunted by those who had been sent out to destroy them.

VARIETY.

The clipper ship Young America was launched from the yard of W. H. Webb, foot of Seventh-st., New York, Saturday. This magnificent clipper is 239 feet 6 inches in length, 43 feet 6 inches breadth of beam, 26 feet hold, with 20 inches dead rise at half floor. Her keel is of white oak; stern and stem-posts, counter timbers, top timbers, fourth futtocks, and each end, of live oak; half-top of cedar; staunchеons of locust; balance of frame of the very best white oak. Her entire frame is double, diagonally strapped with iron plates 4x6-8, crossing each other at right angles, and running from the upper deck frame down to floor-heads. Is copper-fastened below the load line, and iron above.

Advices from Western Africa state that thirty varieties of cotton have been found growing spontaneously in that country. A missionary says he has stood erect under the branches of a cotton tree, in a Geulch village, so heavily laden with bolls that it was propped up with forked sticks to prevent it from breaking down under its own weight. The cotton was equal to that of any country. The natives manufacture cotton goods extensively. Western Africa also abounds in coffee. The whole land is said to be covered with it. In Erravala and Kaffa 200 pounds can be purchased for a dollar. A single tree in Monrovia yielded four and a half bushels in the hull at one time, which made 31 pounds when shelled and dried.

The term "Putting your foot in it," it seems, is of legitimate origin. According to the "Asiatic Researches," a very curious mode of trying the title to land is practiced in Hindostan. Two holes are dug in the disputed spot, in each of which the lawyers on either side put one of their legs, and remain there until one of them is tired, or complains of being stung by insects—in which case his client is defeated. In this country it is generally the client, and not the lawyers, who "puts his foot in it!"

A little girl entered the tavern, and in pitiful tones told the keeper that her mother had sent her there to get eight cents. "Eight cents," said the tavern keeper, "what does your mother want with eight cents? I don't owe her any thing." "Well," said the child, "father spends all his money here for rum, and we have had nothing to eat to-day. Mother wants to buy a loaf of bread." A loafer remarked to the tavern keeper to "kick out that brat." "No," said the tavern keeper, "I'll give her the money, and if the father comes here again, I'll kick him out."

The great success which has attended the construction of tubular bridges has induced some of the British shipbuilders to take up again the question of iron masts. It is stated that tubular masts may be made of iron, stronger and lighter than those of wood, and with the additional advantage that they might slide down one into the other, telescope fashion, while they would require neither shrouds nor stays, leaving for bracing round the yards to the outermost.

The first bit of silver he could call his own, says the Hon. J. T. Buckingham, in his just published "Personal Memoirs," was a ninepence, the proceeds of the sale of a bunch of bristles to a brush maker. He kept it as a pocket piece for years, and then parted with it to pay the postage of a letter to his mother. How much is revealed of the human heart in such a trifling anecdote. The affections overcame the vanity or the incipient love of accumulation, which boyish desires or wants could not conquer.

Alexander Campbell, the founder of the Campbellite Baptist Church, says, in his Harbinger, that he made Rev. Dr. Rice, Editor of the Presbyterian of the West, a Doctor of Divinity; and that Bishop Purcell, of Cincinnati—Roman Catholic—is indebted to him "for his Papal Arch prefix!" These men—Rice and Purcell—had each a debate with Campbell.

A minister's wife, being asked of the place of her nativity, replied: "I am so unfortunate as not to have any native place—I was the daughter of a clergyman."

Ebenezer Pope, a selectman of the town, hung himself last week in Rome, N. Y. The cause was insanity from spiritual rappings.

It is stated by the Hightstown Record, that there is every prospect that the peach crop will be a large one during the coming season.

The Crystal Palace will not probably be ready for the reception of articles before the first of June next.

The United States possess a hundred million acres of public land that the foot of the white man has never trod.

Mrs. Edwin Forest and Lola Montez have gone to California on professional tours. The stage there seems to be as profitable as trade.

The Albion states that Mr. Thackeray cleared about $12,000 by his lectures in this country.

The Arkansas Whig states that large numbers of cattle are being driven from that State to California.

American Sabbath Tract Society's Publications.

THE American Sabbath Tract Society publish the following tracts, which are for sale at its Depository, No. 9 Spruce-st., N. Y., viz:—

No. 1—Reasons for introducing the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment to the consideration of the Christian Public. 28 pp.
No. 2—Moral Nature and Scriptural Observance of the Sabbath. 52 pp.
No. 3—Authority for the Change of the Day of the Sabbath. 28 pp.
No. 4—The Sabbath and Lord's Day: A History of their Observance in the Christian Church. 52 pp.
No. 5—A Christian Caveat to the Old and New Sabbatarians. 4 pp.
No. 6—Twenty Reasons for keeping holy, in each week, the Seventh Day instead of the First Day. 4 pp.
No. 7—Thirty-six Plain Questions presenting the main points in the Controversy; A Dialogue between a Minister of the Gospel and a Sabbatarian; Counterfeit Coin. 8 pp.
No. 8—The Sabbath Controversy: The True Issue. 4 pp.

No. 12—Misuse of the Term Sabbath. 8 pp.
No. 13—The Bible Sabbath. 24 pp.
No. 14—Delaying Obedience. 4 pp.
No. 15—An Appeal for the Restoration of the Bible Sabbath, in an Address to the Baptists, from the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference. 40 pp.

The Society has also published the following works, to which attention is invited:—

A Defense of the Sabbath, in reply to Ward on the Fourth Commandment. By George Carlow. First printed in London, in 1724; reprinted at Stonington, Ct., in 1802; now republished in a revised form. 168 pp.
The Royal Law Contended for. By Edward Stennett. First printed in London, in 1658. 60 pp.
Vindication of the True Sabbath, by J. W. Morton, late Missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. 64 pp.
Also, a periodical sheet, quarto, The Sabbath Vindicator. Price $1 00 per hundred.

The series of fifteen tracts, together with Edward Stennett's "Royal Law Contended for," and J. W. Morton's "Vindication of the True Sabbath," may be had in a bound volume. Price 50 cents.

These tracts will be furnished to those wishing them for distribution or sale, at the rate of 15 pages for one cent. Persons desiring them can have them forwarded by mail or otherwise, on sending their address, with a remittance, to George B. Utter, Corresponding Secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Soc.'s Publications.

The Sabbath Recorder,

Published Weekly.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in Advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

The Sabbath-School Visitor,

Published Monthly.

Terms per Annum—Invariably in advance:

One copy	$ 25
Five copies to one address	1 00
Twelve copies to one address	2 00
Twenty copies to one address	3 00
Twenty-eight copies to one address	4 00
Forty copies to one address	5 00

The Seventh-day Baptist Memorial,

Published Quarterly.

Terms—$1 00 a Year, 25 Cents a Number.

Each number of the Memorial will contain a lithographic portrait of a Seventh-day Baptist preacher, together with a variety of historical, biographical, and statistical matter, designed to illustrate the rise, progress, and present condition of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Wood-cuts of meeting-houses will be introduced from time to time in connection with the history of the churches.

☞ Orders and remittances for the above should be addressed to the General Agent, George B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York

Postage.

The postage on the Sabbath Recorder is 13 cents a year in the State of New York, and 26 cents in any other part of the United States, payable quarterly or yearly in advance.

The postage on the Sabbath-School Visitor is 3 cents a year in the State of New York, and 6 cents in any other part of the United States, payable in advance.

The postage on the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial is 2 cents a year in any part of the United States when paid in advance, or 4 cents a year when not paid in advance.

THE BIBLE IN OUR COMMON SCHOOLS.

Number Two.

BY C. ROLLIN BURDICK, A. B.

We are accustomed to present to our youth the master spirits of Greece and Rome as models of perfection in poetry and eloquence. But in the Bible we can find models even superior to these. The lyre of Apollo finds a successful competition in the harp of David; and Mercury, the patron of eloquence, is outrivaled by Isaiah and Jeremiah. The oratory of the Bible has no equal in profane literature. Its style is elevated, and at the same time simple. Its language is the language of nature. It speaks of God. In power it resembles Niagara, as he lifts his awful voice in praise to God; while in beauty it resembles the rainbow tints that play around that stupendous cataract. Both speak of the inspiration of God. The rich full tones of the one are only equaled by the music of the other. Both inspire the soul with unspeakable emotions of wonder, awe, and sublimity. While contemplating the eloquence of the Bible, we are oppressed by the indescribableness of the emotions produced. We are carried away from the earth, and made to listen to the language of heaven. Our earth-clogged spirits flag in attempting to grasp its beauties and glories. Yet the more we attempt it, the more do we find our souls enlarged, and our ideas of the beautiful and sublime perfected. The fact of its elevation commends it to our consideration. The variety of its topics, also, makes it valuable, and warmly commends it to us. Would we find an oratory breathing a pure and righteous indignation against evil doers, let us go to the Bible. Would we find an oratory breathing heavenly love in every line, and forgiveness and acceptance to repentant man, let us go to the Bible. Would we find an oratory exulting in the decrees of Providence, let us go to the Bible. Would we find an oratory upon which is emblazoned, in unmistakable characters, the stamp of true Divinity, let us go to the Bible. In short, if we would find an oratory, every word of which is true to nature, we must go to the Bible. Such an oratory is rich in figures of speech, abounding in beautiful similes, striking personifications, and stirring apostrophes. The spirit of Isaiah, grieved by the criminal ingratitude of Israel, he cries under the inspiration of God:—

"Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth, for the Lord hath spoken; I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. The ox knoweth its owner, and the ass his master's crib; but Israel doth not know, my people do not consider. Ah! sinful nation; a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evil doers, children that are corrupters; they have forsaken the Lord; they have provoked the Holy One of Israel unto anger; they are gone away backward. Why should ye be stricken any more? Ye will revolt more and more; the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. From the sole of the foot, even unto the head, there is no soundness in it; but wounds and bruises and putrefying sores. They have not been closed, neither bound up, neither molified with ointment. Your country is desolate; your cities are burned with fire; your land, strangers devour it in your presence, and it is desolate, as overthrown by strangers."

Where can we find in more expressive words the language of abused affection, mingled with commiseration and condolence?

"O Zion, that bringest good tidings, get thee up into the high mountain. O Jerusalem, that bringest good tidings, lift up thy voice with strength; lift it up; be not afraid; say unto the cities of Judah, behold your God." "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd; he shall gather the lambs with his arms, and shall gently lead those that are with young."

What can be more beautiful than the figure representing the great and merciful God as acting the part of the tender shepherd? Such representatious could not fail of having a deep and lasting effect upon the mind of youth, when properly applied. Will the reader allow me to repeat a few more such beautiful lines? Take an example of personification:

"Keep silence before me, O islands, and let the people renew their strength; let them come near; then let them speak; let us come near together to judgment."

The prophet, in another place, after enumerating some of the blessed promises to the church, breaks forth into the following joyful strain:—

"Sing, O ye heavens, for the Lord hath done it; shout, ye lower parts of the earth; break forth into singing, ye mountains, O forest, and every tree therein, for the Lord hath redeemed Jacob, and glorified himself in Israel."

And in another place:—

"Drop down, ye heavens, from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness; let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation, and righteousness spring up together. I the Lord have created it."

Babylon, personified as a proud, wicked woman, is thus addressed:—

"Come down, and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon; sit on the ground; there is no throne, O daughter of the Chaldeans; for thou shalt no more be called tender and delicate."

Where has the tongue of uninspired eloquence dropped such strains as the following?

"Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters; and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk, without money and without price."

The prophet, groaning in spirit, utters the following prayer for his people:—

"O that thou wouldst rend the heavens; that thou wouldst come down; that the mountains might flow down at thy presence, as when the melting fire burneth; the fire causeth the waters to boil, to make thy name known to thy adversaries, that the nations may tremble at thy presence."

I would gladly repeat the whole prayer, did space permit. Leaving the Old Testament, let us take a hasty view of the eloquence of the New Testament. Let us behold our Saviour's mild, majestic person, seated upon the Mount, delivering that sermon, the praises of which will be celebrated, in angelic strains, when the eloquence of Demosthenes and Cicero shall be forgotten. His divine heart, moved with compassion at the sufferings of humanity, and longing to breathe comfort into the hearth of the afflicted, while at the same time he would rebuke all unholy desires, gave utterance to words such as an apostate and guilty world had never before listened to. Such mild, yet spirit-stirring eloquence, is above all eulogy. Yet the more we contemplate it, and attempt to grasp its perfections, glowing with a holy, a heavenly radiance, in every line, the more is our standard of true eloquence elevated, Christ's Sermon on the Mount cannot be regarded by the impartial critic as any thing less than the great master-piece of all oratory. Hear his words in another place:—

"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls; for my yoke is easy, and my burden is light."

What strains of eloquence ever fell from the lips of mere man equal to these? Let us go through the whole Bible, and from Genesis to Revelation we shall find it all redolent with the most sparkling gems of eloquence. No book, nor all other books, ever published, furnish more themes for the orator than this holy book. The mightiest orators that ever shook the forum or the sacred desk with their eloquence, have indited their matter from it. Luther and Melancthon, Calvin, Tilotson, Burnet, Bunyan, Hooker, Taylor, Pascal, Bourdelone, Bossuet, Whitefield, and a host of other bright luminaries, that shine in the diadem of the church, have found in this sacred book ample food upon which to feed their mighty intellects. To inspire the young with a love for true eloquence, I would have them familiar with every book, chapter and verse of the Bible. And to make them so, I would have it used in our common schools, as well as in our higher institutions of learning. I would have it read very frequently in the presence of youth, and require them to read it and study it much.

WATKINS, N. Y., April 23, 1853.

A VISIT FROM GOD.

"Never had I such a visit from God, since I knew him," said Mr. Grimshaw, a devoted minister of Whitefield's time, when he was attacked by an infectious disease, which he felt assured would prove fatal. He had long enjoyed the light of God's countenance, but now that the angel of death stood over him, he had such a manifestation of the divine presence as led him to make the exclamation above recorded. With such a support, he could exclaim, "My last enemy is come? The signs of death are upon me, but I am not afraid. No, no! Blessed be God, my hope is sure, and I am in his hands."

This confidence was the result of a life of faith of many years' continuance. Those who would have peace in a dying hour, and have God's visit to their soul precious then, must not spend their days at a distance from him.

Mr. Grimshaw did not look upon this precious visit as a reward of merit. He looked to Christ alone as the ground of his hope. When he looked at himself, he exclaimed, "Alas! what have my wretched services been? And now I have need to cry, at the close of my unprofitable life, God be merciful to me a sinner."

Let us not yield place to the idea entertained by some, that good men are disposed to exaggerate their faults. When good men are on the borders of eternity, and expect soon to pass into the immediate presence of God, they adhere in their statements most scrupulously to the truth. In the light that shines into their souls from eternity, they see themselves more clearly than ever before. Hence their despair of themselves, and their estimate of the great imperfection and utter worthlessness of all they have done. If, with visions partially cleared, the best of men see how far short they have come, and form such a low estimate of their services, how must our services appear in the eye of God, who sees things just as they are?

Just before Mr. Grimshaw died, a friend named Jeremiah Robertson came to see him. When they parted, Mr. Grimshaw took him by the hand, and said, "The Lord bless you, Jerry; I will pray for you as long as I live; and if there be such a thing as praying in heaven, I will pray for you there also."

Would that all Christian friends would adopt that resolution in regard to praying for each other. If Christians prayed more for one another, they would love one another more. If Christians loved one another more, Christ would receive greater honor. [Evang.

MY TIMES ARE IN THY HAND.

My times are in Thy hand!
I know not what a day,
Or e'en an hour, may bring to me;
But I am safe while trusting Thee,
Though all things fade away.
All weakness, I
On him rely,
Who fixed the earth, and spread the starry sky.

My times are in Thy hand!
Pale poverty or wealth,
Corroding care or calm repose,
Spring's balmy breath, or winter's snows,
Sickness or buoyant health—
Whate'er betide,
If God provide,
'T is for the best—I wish no lot beside.

My times are in Thy hand!
Should friendship pure illume,
And strew my path with fairest flowers,
Or should I spend life's dreary hours
In solitude's dark gloom,
Thou art a Friend
Till time shall end,
Unchangeably the same; in Thee all beauties blend.

My times are in Thy hand!
Many or few my days,
I leave with Thee—this only pray,
That by Thy grace I, every day
Devoting to Thy praise,
May ready be
To welcome Thee,
Whene'er Thou com'st to set my spirit free.

My times are in Thy hand!
Howe'er those times may end,
Sudden or slow my soul's release,
Midst anguish, frenzy, or in peace,
I'm safe with Christ, my friend.
If He be nigh,
Howe'er I die,
'T will be the dawn of heavenly ecstacy.

My times are in Thy hand!
To Thee I can intrust
My slumbering clay till Thy command
Bids all the dead before Thee stand,
Awaking from the dust.
Beholding Thee,
What bliss 't will be
With all Thy saints to spend eternity.

To spend eternity
In heaven's unclouded light!
From sorrow, sin, and frailty free,
Beholding and resembling Thee—
O, too transporting sight!
Prospect too fair
For flesh to bear!
Haste, haste, my Lord, and soon transport me there.

THAT THE MINISTRY BE NOT BLAMED.

"Good morning, Mr. Mansfield," said Deacon Williams, as he came very unexpectedly upon his neighbor, who was surveying his fields from a gentle elevation which was not far from the center of his farm.

"Good morning, Deacon," replied Mr. Mansfield, slightly blushing, because, perhaps, he thought he was not found employed in the best possible manner.

"You have a fine farm here," said the Deacon; "you have been highly prospered since you came to the place."

"I have indeed, and I try to be thankful for it."

"What are your prospects for fruit this year?"

"Very good; all my trees blossomed very full, and if we have no frosts, I shall have a large quantity of fruits of all kinds."

"When my orchard first began to bear, which was about twenty years ago, I found it difficult to get any of the fruit myself. It would all be stolen before it was ripe."

"I lost some when I first came into the place, but a great change has taken place. I have had nothing stolen for many years; I do not know that I have had any stolen since Mr. James became our minister—certainly not since the first revival under his ministry."

"His labors have effected a great change in the character of the parish, and indeed of the town. Property has risen in value to a much greater amount than has been paid him for his salary, and the rise has been owing solely to the change in the moral and religious character of the place, caused mainly by the revivals which have followed his labors."

"I believe you speak what every candid man will admit to be the truth."

"The parish owes Mr. James a little over two hundred dollars on his last year's salary, and he is suffering considerable embarrassment through want of it. I called to see if you could pay your subscription. At our last parish meeting, it was voted, you know, that all arrears should be paid before the first of June, and that time is near at hand. Mr. James was told what has been done, and made his arrangements accordingly."

"I am sorry it so happens, but the truth is, I have only about a dozen dollars on hand, and I owe just about that sum to Mr. Jenkins. He is owing money, and his creditors are driving him. I must pay him what money I have, and pay my subscription as soon as I can."

"But why must Mr. Jenkins be paid in preference to Mr. James?"

"Well, his creditors are uneasy, and are afraid they shall lose by him; but no one is afraid of losing any thing by Mr. James."

"Which debt was contracted first?"

"I do not understand you."

"Did you become indebted to Mr. Jenkins before you made your subscription for the salary?"

"The debt I owe Jenkins was contracted only a few days ago. I did not understand your question, because we do not commonly class our subscription for the minister's salary among our debts."

"In the order of time, then, Mr. James' debt would come first, and ought to be paid first, unless there be some conclusive reason for pursuing an opposite course. Mr. Jenkins' creditors are uneasy for fear they may lose by him. If you do not pay him immediately, you may cause a continuance of that uneasiness. Now let us see what evil may result from not paying Mr. James immediately. His creditors may not be afraid of losing their debt, but they may blame him for not being punctual. Not long ago, I heard a man say that ministers preach punctuality in the payment of debts, but never practice it. What is the reason? In almost all cases, it is because their salaries are not paid according to agreement. I know that Mr. James always pays his bills as soon as he receives any funds from the treasurer. When he fails to pay them when they become due, he is blamed just as much as if the failure occurred through his own fault. Paul exhorts to give no offense in any thing, that the ministry be not blamed. Why was the apostle so desirous of having the ministry free from all censure? In order that it may be the most efficient instrument for good. When the ministry is blamed, its power of doing good is weakened. If a man should go and buy a new sharp axe, and then dull its edge so that he could not cut more than half as much wood with it as he could if he had kept it sharp, he would not be looked upon as a very wise man. And so if we get a minister, and take away half the influence which he might exert, it seems to me that we are not doing a very wise thing. Do you think we are?"

"No; but I do not think that my paying my subscription a few days sooner or later will affect Mr. James' influence. His character is established. I could not very well lessen his influence if I wished to."

"I differ from you there. It is true that Mr. James is a very blameless man; still, while the human heart is as it is, it will be easy to give occasion to some to blame his ministry."

"I am sure I should be very sorry to give any one occasion to blame Mr. James. No man sets more by him than I do. If you think he is likely to suffer through want of my subscription, I will borrow it, and let you have it in the course of the day."

"You had better do so."

"I will; there is scarcely any thing which I would not do for Mr. James."

"I think it is well that you are attached to him, for he deserves the love of all; but the obligation to prevent the ministry from being blamed would be just as strong if you had no personal attachment for him. Mr. James is a man; the ministry is the institution of the Lord Jesus Christ. I think it important that we care more for Christ's institution than for any man. I once knew a man who had the right ideas on this subject, and cherished a right spirit in relation to it. His name was Grant. When the minister came into the place, an enemy got his ear, and telling him what was false, prejudiced him greatly against Mr. Grant. This appeared in his manner. He treated him so coldly that it was observed by many, and some said to Grant, that he ought not to bear it."

"The minister was wrong. He had no right to be prejudiced against any of his people."

"I admit that, but I was speaking of Mr. Grant's conduct. He urged his friends to keep still; he contended that the minister was a good man, and would in time find out his error. He did all he could to strengthen the minister's hands, because he was interested in the work the minister was engaged to do. 'It would be a strange thing,' he said, 'for a boy to hinder a man from doing his father's work, because the man might not happen to like him.' He desired that the ministry should not be blamed; for he regarded it as the great means of promoting his Heavenly Father's glory. I am afraid we do not think enough of the ministry. We think quite enough of some ministers, but do we think enough of the ministry as God's institution, designed to promote the salvation of men? We are interested in its efficiency as much as the minister himself is."

"The subject never came before my mind in that shape before."

"Think it over, and see if the views I have presented are not the true ones."

"If you will go with me to the house, I will pay my subscription, and borrow the money for Mr. Jenkins." [N. Y. Observer.

BIBLICAL ASSOCIATIONS AT ROME.

One of the editors of The Independent, who is now traveling in the East, writes from Rome as follows:—

At Rome the Christian traveler journeying estward first comes in contact with those scriptural associations which will thenceforth impart the chief interest to his journey. It is not that Peter is magnified at Rome into a second Jove, and worshiped in the identical image of Jupiter Capitolinus, or that the most spacious and magnificent basilica of the Christian world bears the name of the son of Jonas, for every student of church history will share the doubts of learned men as to whether Peter ever visited Rome at all, while there is internal evidence in the epistle to the Romans, that up to the date of that letter Peter had not been at Rome. True, the place of his martyrdom is pointed out at the church of S. Pietro in Montorio, and his chains are exhibited in the church of S. Pietro in Vinculo, the basilica of St. John Lateran possesses his head, while his other members are divided between two other churches, and there is a little road-side chapel with a rude bas-relief that marks the spot where Peter and Paul took leave of each other on the day when both suffered martyrdom—but all this does not excite in the Christian traveler any scriptural associations. But we know that Paul dwelt in Rome for two whole years—a prisoner at large in his own hired house; we know that some of his epistles were written here, and from his epistles to Timothy we know that at length his chains were drawn tightly, and he was appointed "to be offered." It matters little whether the church of the Three Fountains covers the precise spot where he was beheaded, and where it is alledged that fountains gushed forth at each spot touched by his rolling head, or that the stately basilica of St. Paul without the walls incloses his tomb, containing a part of his body, while his head rests with Peter's in the urn at St. John Lateran—where he lived and where he suffered are of minor consequence, since we know that he looked upon the imperial pomp of that Rome of the Cæsars, whose perished grandeur lies in fragments about the base of the Captoline hill; since we know that in the living presence of that idolatry whose stupendous monuments we here discover, he preached Christ crucified.

We know, too, that in the very center of the amphitheater, whose broken walls remain the mightiest structure of the ancient world, scores, and hundreds, and thousands of Christians, were thrown as a prey to the wild beasts for the entertainment of the Roman populace. We know that here Ignatius, brought up from Antioch, sealed his testimony with his blood. We know that in the adjacent gardens of the Palace of the Cæsars, the monster Nero feasted his eyes upon the bodies of martyrs wrapped in flaming pitch. These things we know, and though not of sacred history, they impart a melancholy religious interest to the ruins of ancient Rome. The arch of Titus, also, commemorating in profuse bas-reliefs the capture of Jerusalem and the deportation of its sacred vessels to Rome, affords a graphic comment upon the prophecy of Christ and the narrative of Josephus. The catacombs, and their inscriptions, now entabled in the Vatican, illustrate the early history of the Church.

THE MARTYR MACKAIL.

One of these sufferers is worthy of special remark, in himself, and as the prototype of Mac Briar in Old Mortality—a character disfigured in some traits, but on the whole of surpassing power, beauty, and pathos. This was Hugh Mackail. He was a young minister of twenty-six—had traveled on the continent—possessed a liking for letters—amused himself in prison composing Latin verses—but was withal a zealous and fiery Covenanter. He was put to a species of torture equally cruel and clumsy, called the Boots. This instrument was composed of four pieces of narrow boards nailed together, into which when the leg was laid, wedges were driven down with a hammer, mangling the limb, forcing out the marrow, and producing exquisite pain. Mackail bore it with great firmness, denied all knowledge of the existence of a conspiracy, and asserted that the rising of Pentland was altogether accidental. His appearance on the scaffold excited floods of tears from the spectators. There was not, says an eye-witness, "a dry eye in the whole street." He was so young, had been so popular, and was possessed of a hectic beauty, which now seemed, from the composure of his mind and the magnanimity of his resolve, to be tinctured with the hues of heaven. The pale white cloud assumed a golden tinge as it approached the west. He went up the ladder, telling his fellow sufferers that he felt every step of it a degree nearer heaven. And when he reached the summit, he burst out into the words, "Farewell, father and mother, friends and relations! farewell, the world and all delights! farewell, meat and drink! farewell, sun, moon, and stars! Welcome God and Father! welcome sweet Jesus Christ, the Mediator of the New Covenant! welcome blessed Spirit of grace, the God of all consolation! welcome glory! welcome eternal life, and welcome death!" It was worth a hundred poems. An apostle could not have left the stage of time with firmer assurance, or with loftier language on his lips. With what true, unconscious taste, he makes the climax, not in glory, but in "death!" [Gilfillan.

JUDICIOUS TRAINING OF YOUTH.

During last summer, a select committee was appointed by the British House of Commons to investigate the causes and remedies of juvenile delinquencies. A vast amount of testimony was taken, which is now in course of publication. Among the persons examined was a Mr. John Ellis, a shoemaker, who has been a Ragged-School teacher for eight years. A gentleman furnished him with means to take in charge fifteen boys between the ages of twelve and nineteen, of whom some had committed criminal offenses, and all were extremely vicious. The character of these boys was very unpromising; the course pursued, and the result obtained, may be gathered from the following questions and answers.

"Will you proceed to state the way in which these boys were treated?" I thought that one cause of their crime was want of employment; they had never been used to work, and no one had ever taken them by the hand to train them into the way of work. I made the employment of shoemaking as amusing to them as I possibly could, and I found that the boys were very fond of making things themselves, such as shoes. I used to go and sit with them for two or three hours a day, and I used to tell them that they might, by governing their tongues, their tempers, and their appetites, and governing themselves generally, be much more happy, if they would put themselves in harmony with the laws of their own physical nature; and I showed them how wrong it was to break the social laws that bind society together, and also the laws of God, and so forth. And I considered that my conversation with them for two or three hours had had a great effect; and I provided them with wholesome food, and I gave them clothes to wear, and I surrounded them with as many comforts as I possibly could.

"Will you explain to the committee what was the effect which you gradually saw attained upon the minds of these three boys, in consequence of the attention which you paid them?" I at once recognized them as my children; they looked upon me as their father; and the latent power of their souls being brought into existence, there was every feeling that I could exact from a child towards me.

"Had they at first any moral sense?" No; when I first took them, they did not know right from wrong.

"Will you explain to the committee up to what point of training you have carried these boys in the school, and how gradually introduced them into your house?" My principal object always was with those lads to put in their power the means of getting a living, by teaching them a business; with regard to their morals, I thought I could not do better than set before them a good example, and I ate with them, and drank with them, and slept with them, and I associated myself with them in every way; and as far as religion goes (I don't profess to be a religious teacher,) I showed them the law of the gospel as well as I could. I am not much of a scholar myself, and therefore I could not cultivate their intellects much.

"You consider that some person should, like yourself, be placed in the position of a parent, to give them good moral principle?" That is what we want. I contend that the great cause of juvenile crime is the effects of a bad mother's training.

"Have you had any boys that you have been obliged to give up, whom you positively could not reclaim?" I have never seen such a case, and I have confidence that if I had any boy who had his right senses about him, I could reform him.

"How long have these boys been under your superintendence?" I have known them these seven years, but it is four years since we formed the class. They have been in my house about two years and a half; the committee gave them up. I got places for them, and some of the more expert ones in the business are now paying me back what they have cost me, and they have all solemnly pledged themselves to pay me back by their labor every farthing which they have cost me. When moral dignity and Scriptural charity is manifested by human beings, a child will see it and adore it. Though I never used the rod or any thing else of that sort, there is a feeling in those lads that brings them to perfect submission; they dread my looks, or frown, or a word from me, more than they would dread the lash.

Finally, says Mr. Ellis, "these lads, who were once a disgrace and a curse to society, are now as decent and fine young men as ever you saw." No experiment could have been more completely successful.

A MEETING IN THE SNOW-STORM.

I rode two miles, in peril and suffering, during a severe storm, to attend a prayer-meeting. And why did I go? Because an anxious sinner would go if I went. The meeting was opened with prayer, and the pastor requested, as few were present, that all should express their feelings with perfect freedom. He bowed to a lady near him to commence. She said, with a faint voice, "I think I have peace in Jesus Christ." Next, a medical student could say, "Whereas I was blind, now I see." Then an interesting young man said, in a tremulous voice, "I think the goodness of God has led me to repentance." Another young man wept, while he said he had indulged hope two years, yet it now seemed to him that he had been asleep the whole time. Next sat a man trembling, who he said, "I am in a horrible pit, and there is no way out." A professor of religion near him offered prayer that the Saviour would appear for him, and "while we were yet speaking," the poor man seemed to gain relief. There sat next a man who had been excommunicated from the Church at his own request, who wept and prayed.

The anxious sinner who rode two miles to get to the meeting, was bowed under an oppressive load. His agony increased, and as the pastor pronounced the benediction, he begged for prayer particularly for himself, who was sinking in the pit. Prayer was offered, in which the whole of Watts's version of the 51st Psalm was repeated:

"Show pity, Lord; O Lord, forgive;
Let a repenting rebel live."

The sinner rose from his knees, saying, with great solemnity, "As for me, I will serve the Lord." The pastor kneeled and gave thanks to God, and we went home rejoicing, feeling that we would travel many a tedious mile, even in a snow-storm, to attend another meeting like this.

THE DEACON'S MEETING.

I was surprised, on entering the church, to see so large an assembly. It seemed, indeed, as large as one might reasonably expect to find collected from such a village, in the most auspicious circumstances; and it was evidently composed of those who felt it no less a privilege than a duty to assemble themselves together for worship and instruction.

In a short time, one of the deacons—a patriarch in years—arose, and taking his place by the side of the communion-table, in a voice somewhat tremulous with age, informed the people of their pastor's absence, and that, in consequence, the services of the day would be conducted by the other officers of the church. He then began, and went through them, if not with as much of the "suaviter in modo" as the minister, yet doubtless with as much fervor and sincerity.

The sermon, it is true, was not fresh from the throbbing brain, and bore no savor of the midnight lamp; but it was evangelical after the strictest school, and had, at least, the good quality of an honest purpose.

The choir, too, appeared to have exerted themselves to make the music more than usually attractive. In short, there seemed to be a very general effort made to sustain the usual forms of devotion with devoutness and punctuality. Were this spirit manifested wherever there is a dearth of preachers, would it not be much for the enlargement of the Christian church? Would it not be more in accordance with the practice of the primitive Christians, than the state of things we find prevailing at the present time? Should we not thereby gain a greater independence on the mere outward form of devotion, together with a better experience of its true power, which would contribute to a more healthy growth of spiritual life?

MAN UNDONE.—"What hast thou done?" Gen. 4: 10. The late Rev. Rowland Hill, of London, visited the Isle of Wight in 1815, and preached at Cowes, from this text. He commenced his sermon in these words:—"In my way to your Island, I visited the county jail at Winchester, and there I saw many who were accused of heavy crimes, but who appeared careless and indifferent, and to have but little sense of their awful situation. But one young man attracted my attention; he kept separate from the rest, and his countenance betrayed deep emotion. I went up to him and said, 'And what have you done, young man?' 'Oh, sir,' said he, deeply affected, 'I have done that which I cannot undo, and which has undone me.' This, my dear friends," said the venerable minister, "is the situation of every one of you. You have each of you done that which has undone you, and which you cannot undo."

HUMAN DEPRAVITY.

The superlative deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the human heart being a doctrine of Scripture, (Jer. 17 : 9,) it is important that we understand how much is meant by it. Some who profess to believe it, hold other views which are in such collision with it, that we are forced to doubt whether they really receive all that the Word of God teaches on this point. The complete ruin of the sinner, his utter helplessness in himself, his entire dependence on Him "who hath mercy on whom he will have mercy," the absolute certainty that he will be damned unless free and unmerited grace snatch him as a brand from the burning, are points of doctrine which stand or fall with the depravity of the heart; and, for ourselves, we cannot resist the conviction that he whose faith is but loosely defined with regard to these points, is somewhat deficient in his views of the corruption of man's nature.

We say the corruption of man's nature; at which expression some may be inclined to cavil, as if it implied that God, by creative power, had wrought sin into man's being, and made it an attribute of his existence. But such cavils usually spring from inability to meet the strength of evidence by which the doctrine in question is sustained. The expression—let it imply what it may—is certainly not more faulty than that of the Apostle, who speaks of sinners as being "by nature the children of wrath," Eph. 2 : 3; and again of the "natural man" as incapable of knowing and receiving the things of the Spirit of God. 1 Cor. 2 : 14.

We receive the inspired definition of sin, that it is "the transgression of the law." 1 John 3 : 4. At the same time, we cannot conceive of sin as a voluntary act, which does not spring from a nature, or disposition, already corrupted. Even in the case of Adam himself, the corruption of his heart had been already effected, before he committed the overt act of eating the forbidden fruit. As the stream always implies the fountain, so the voluntary act always implies the disposition from which it springs.

We believe that man's nature is corrupt, understanding by this term the disposition, tendency, or propensity of his heart. His propensity is to evil, and to nothing but evil, according to that scripture which teaches, that "every imagination of the thought of his heart is only evil continually." Gen. 6 : 5. Those who cavil at the term, should remember that the nature of a thing is determinable as much by the relation which it uniformly bears to all other things in the universe, as by any thing inherent in it without regard to such relation. We say it is the nature of a stone to be heavy; yet we so speak of it, because here in this world, where God has placed it, it always possesses this quality. But if it were removed beyond the attractive influence of the earth, it would have no such quality. On the same principle, we speak of the natural man as a sinful or depraved being, because here in this world, where God has made and placed him, he manifests nothing but a spirit of rebellion against the divine law. It is folly to speculate upon what man would be, were he placed in other conditions and relations than what he is. It is enough that, related as he is, and holding such a connection as he does to the system of existence where God has placed him, he is always found rebellious. For this connection is as much a matter of God's ordering, as his simple existence itself.

We adhere to old-fashioned language, therefore, and insist upon it, that man is by nature a corrupt, fallen, ruined, helpless, hell-deserving creature. What less is implied in our Saviour's doctrine concerning the necessity of regeneration? Why should man need a second birth, if his nature were not corrupted in the first birth? If there were any thing in the natural man that was pleasing to God, it might be cultivated and increased; in which case, old things would not need to pass away, and all things to become new. A mere reformation, or a simple change from disobedience to obedience, as our correspondent last week expressed it, would suffice.

Regeneration is not a mere reformation, or change from disobedience to obedience, accomplished in part by the sinner himself; it is a radical transformation of the heart, which makes the subject feel that he is in a new world. "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." It is a new creation; not a mere amendment of life. And we cannot be too deeply sensible of that superlatively desperate corruption of our nature, which renders this new creation necessary. T. B. B.

REVIVAL AT CUSSEWAGO, PA.

HAYFIELD, Pa., May 4, 1853.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Presuming that information concerning the prosperity of the work of God in this place would interest the readers of the Recorder, I would submit the following brief notice of a revival interest which we have lately been permitted to enjoy.

I have preached occasionally for years, and during the last year once in two weeks, in Cussewago, where some families of the Hayfield society reside. About the last of February, I commenced holding evening meetings in that place, and visiting from house to house during the day. The meetings were held about three weeks, when my health failed, and I was compelled to quit and go home. The school-house in which we worshiped was very much crowded, yet the best order prevailed throughout. We introduced no novelty to attract attention, not even an "anxious seat;" but endeavored to present the plain truths of the gospel, expecting the blessing of God to accompany His appointed means; and we were not disappointed; Christians were very much revived, backsliders reclaimed, and about twenty-five gave evidence of being converted to God, most of whom have been baptized.

At the close of the meeting, we constituted a Seventh-day Baptist Church of fourteen members. Twelve have since been added, with a prospect of several more soon. A few of these have lately embraced the Sabbath.

Some revival influence has been felt in the Hayfield Church. I baptized two in that church last Sabbath; one had been baptized before. A. A. F. RANDOLPH.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Sunday Opening—Prussian Holy Day—Popery in Germany—Baptists in Prussia, &c.

GLASGOW, April 29, 1853.

On Monday last, a deputation of Working Men waited on our Home Secretary, Lord Palmerston, and presented a Memorial deprecating the consequences which they apprehended would result from the opening, if permitted, of the Crystal Palace on Sundays. His Lordship said he was glad to have met them; and, as they had been fair with him in stating their views, he also would express to them the opinions he held on the question. He could not see how the Sunday opening of the place would be productive of the amount of evil which they had described. It was only his own private opinion that he expressed, and he would still give the matter his most serious consideration; but he could not see the harm of a person devoting part of the day to worship, and going afterwards to view these pleasure grounds. He had himself frequently taken a ferry across the river on Sundays, and had even taken a row himself, and had, on such occasions, seen the banks lined with people taking a breath of fresh air. He would not object to the shutting of public houses and beer-shops on that day; and it was one of the advantages which the Palace would serve, that it would draw the people from such places. Little help will our Sunday-observing friends likely receive from his Lordship, when the question comes to be decided.

On Tuesday, a public meeting of the inhabitants of the eastern district of Glasgow was held in the Mechanics' Hall, Canning-street, Counsellor Moir in the chair, for the purpose of considering what means should be adopted to obtain the Sunday opening of our Botanic Garden, and the London Crystal Palace. They resolved to petition the Legislature for the latter object.

A correspondent of the London Record newspaper, of Monday last, gives us a contribution towards the full evidence of that universal testimony to the change of the Sabbath which consists in the practice of an apostate church. Under the date, Berlin, April 20th, he writes, "To-day is the Basstag and Bettag, or day of repentance and prayer, in Prussia—a day set apart for the purpose by Frederick the Great. This and Good-Friday form the two holy days of Prussia; all Sundays, &c., being kept more as holidays than any thing else." Here, therefore, Sunday is not a holy day. It is only a holiday—whatever difference of idea these terms are meant to express.

The Dutch are in a ferment at the late Papal measure establishing the hierarchy amongst them. The Ministry announced to the Chambers, on the 18th inst., that their ambassador at the Court of Rome had been recalled, and that very energetic representations had been made to the Pope on the subject. Although the number of Papists in that country nearly equals that of the Protestants, the latter have manifested the most determined opposition to this movement—although it is stated that many of them are more afraid of the King's exercise of despotic power than they are even of Papal intrigue. A deputation having presented a petition to his Majesty against farther concession to the Court of Rome, the reply was so much in accordance with the views of the petitioners, and implying opposition on the part of the Cabinet, that the Ministers required of the King an explanation, or the acceptance of their resignation. The latter was granted them. The telegraph to-day announces, that three days ago the second Chamber was dissolved by order of the King.

At the 41st Anniversary of the Baptist Union, held at the Mission House, London, this day week, the Rev. Dr. Steane stated that the condition of the suffering brethren in Prussia had been represented to Chevalier Bunsen, the Prussian Minister in this country. The Memorial was forwarded to the Prussian Government, with a letter from the Chevalier to the King. His Majesty, in reply, made certain inquiries as to the faith and order of the churches—especially if it was esteemed necessary that baptism be performed in the open air. This question was suggested by the fact that a riot had occurred on some such occasion; and on being informed that it was not deemed necessary, the favorable result is announced, both through the Prussian Minister, and by letters from Mr. Oncken and others, of a considerable modification of the law having been made in their behalf. A decree has already been issued, not only giving toleration to Baptists, but placing their churches on the same footing as the old Lutheran churches. Towards this favorable result, Dr. Steane remarked, the efforts of the American churches had contributed. On the Continent of Europe there are 42 Baptist churches, with 356 preaching stations, and comprising 4,215 members—all resulting, it was stated, within twenty-five years, from Mr. Oncken's labors. Encouragement was being taken to endeavor to influence other Governments to yield religious liberty to their subjects.

The Hansard Knollys Baptist Publishing Society Annual Meeting was also held on the 21st inst. Their report intimates a necessity for shortly discontinuing farther publication, in consequence of the insufficient number of subscribers. They propose to sell their early printed works at a reduced price.

Last night the Canada Clergy Reserves Bill was read a third time in the House of Lords. There is, therefore, little reason to doubt it will pass into a law. On the second reading, it was fiercely attacked by the Bishop of Exeter, although an amendment he proposed was afterwards withdrawn, in deference to the opinion of the Earl of Derby, who, himself, proposed an amendment of a modified character, which was rejected by a large majority. J. A. BEGG.

MISSION OF YOUTHFUL SABBATH-KEEPERS—NO. 6.

Piety not only gives a love for truth, and progress in everything truthful and good, but it also gives a spirit of self-sacrificing effort and toil. All advancement—all reforms—are effected by hard and persevering labor. No great good comes, save by corresponding effort. The moral leaders of man must expect hard work with little pay. They must look to the future for their rewards. You need, young friends, to be imbued with such a spirit. You need that same sacrificing, laborious industry, that characterized such men as Luther, Zuingle, Melancthon, Calvin, Knox, Owen, Howe, Baxter—indeed, all those that have advanced truth and religion. The moral as well as the physical elements, tend to equilibrium, inactivity, and decay, if there are no disturbing causes. It is only by the unwearied exertions of truth-seekers, of reformers, that these elements are kept in motion, and moral stagnation is prevented. Those moral teachers that deal only with old and popular principles and practices, may have easy tasks, fat livings, and European tours; but such is not the lot of those who labor for new or unpopular principles or practices. You must be willing to undergo toil, privation, and persecution.

Again, education must ever hold a prominent place in your preparation for entering upon your mission. This is especially demanded, as your labor is to be of a highly intellectual character. Your field comprises the domain of intellect in its highest sphere of activity—in its search after truth. To have influence here, it is necessary that you should be educated—highly educated. Other things being equal, the power and influence of individuals, of classes, of societies, of nations, increase in proportion as they increase in knowledge. The history of the world testifies to this truth, for in every age, societies and nations have had more or less power and control, as they have been more or less educated. If, as a denomination, we are to have influence, we must be an educated people. We cannot command respect by our numbers, nor gain favor by the popularity of our doctrine. If it is obtained, it must be by our intellectual and moral worth and power. In this age of intellectual progress, we need not expect to attain even mediocrity of respect or influence without great intellectual worth. Our contest with the world is to be sharp and long continued, requiring the use of the keenest, best cultivated intellect. Most of the learning of the world is against us. We need intellect and learning to oppose intellect and learning. We need learned farmers, learned artizans, learned merchants, learned men in the professions, not merely that they may succeed better in their respective callings, but that they may stand up in this world of mind, and claim a place and be heard in their defense of truth. Especially do we need an educated ministry. We need ministers who are scholars in all departments of learning, but more especially those who are scholars in the Word of God, as found in the languages in which it was originally written. We very much need good, thorough linguists. All disputes based upon the meaning of the Word of God, must make their ultimate appeal to the Scriptures, as originally written. We have more cause than most denominations, for disagreement with the common practices of the Christian world. Our disagreement is professedly based upon the Bible; hence we have more need of a thorough knowledge of those languages upon which the ultimate appeal must rest.

If there is this need of educated individuals, there is also a need of literary institutions for educating them. We are continually in want of individuals for moral and religious leaders and teachers, and yet we take no efficient measures to provide such. We seem to console ourselves with the idea, that if we need men, the Lord in his tender mercy will send them to us, as plentifully and as speedily as he did quails to the famishing Israelites. We seem to be laboring under the illusion, that if it is our duty to undertake any benevolent enterprise, why, of course, it is the duty of the Lord to search out and prepare the men for us; and we very complacently fold our arms, and quietly wait for the Lord to raise them up and send them like doves flocking to our windows. But God does not so deal with men. He has proclaimed a law, which is irrevocable and unchangeable, that preparation must ever precede action—that sowing must ever precede harvesting; and if we, like the sluggard, neglect to sow, we will be doomed, like him, to beg in harvest, and have nothing. But we not only need such educational institutions of a denominational character, to prepare individuals for making aggressive movements—for enabling the denomination to make anything like progress in the world—but they are also necessary to enable us to maintain our own, or sustain vitality. Our youth of energy and enterprise will be educated, somewhere and somehow. If they cannot find suitable institutions within the bounds of the denomination, they will seek them elsewhere; and our experience in this respect has been and will continue to be the same as other denominations. The late Dr. Olin gave it as the result of much and careful investigation, that at least three-fourths of the Methodist young men of this country, who have been educated without the pale of the Methodist church, have either given up all religion, or else united themselves with other denominations. Similar to this has been the experience of all those denominations that have depended upon external aid for the education of their youth. What are our churches doing to prevent this constant defection of their youthful members? Not only this, but what are they also doing to provide themselves with an educated ministry? What for providing missionaries? What contributions, among our manifold contributings, are ever made for these objects? Who, from his abundance, thinks of founding a "school of the Prophets?" Who thinks of opening a perennial fountain of science and religion, from which we might receive supplies through all future years?

We would not, if we could, conceal from you, young friends, the fact that you are coming forward to assume the responsibilities of active life in a denomination where most important means for spiritual growth, for the aggressive developement of truth and religion, are wanting—where the most important educational facilities are greatly lacking—where educated men—where denominational authorship and literature, are greatly wanting. Doubtless many of these deficiencies will have to be supplied by yourselves, and it becomes you to prepare accordingly. You will have to be educators, supplying "men and means"—elucidators of truth, both by example and precept—intellectual elevators of the denomination. Your position and prospects demand that you should acquire the best possible education, despite all opposition. You must clothe yourselves with the habiliments of knowledge. You must drink deep and refreshing draughts from Castalian fountains. You must store your minds with intellectual treasures, that you may be prepared to give unto others. If it is a Christian duty to distribute of your goods unto such as have need of them, much more is it a duty to prepare to impart intellectual riches unto those perishing for the want of them. As the wants of the immortal mind are of more importance than the wants of the perishing body, and its demands more imperative, so the requirements of you, to prepare to meet these demands, are more important and imperative than those of the body. Knowledge, like bread for the hungry in the hands of Christ, is increased, almost miraculously increased, in proportion as it is distributed. Prepare yourselves thus to distribute it. Seek light and truth, that you may bear them before the world. Strive to elevate your own minds, that you may elevate the minds of others. Strive to roll back the cloud of ignorance, that the rays of science may beam unobstructed upon the human intellect.

We have thus, young friends, attempted to point out some of the characteristics and requirements of your mission. If such are some of its chief characteristics and demands, how great should be your qualifications in entering upon it—how careful your preparation—how untiring your zeal in its prosecution—how elevated your motives! May you comprehend its relations—may you realize the obligations which it imposes upon you to improve aright the time and talents Heaven has granted you—may you ever be willing to follow implicitly the pointings of the finger of duty—may you ever seek Omnipotent aid in fulfilling your varied and responsible mission.

Permit me, in conclusion, as expressive of the personal qualifications requisite to the proper accomplishment of your mission, to propose for a principal and controlling motto of your lives: INDUSTRY, INTELLIGENCE, and RELIGION.

Practice an industry, that possesses the characteristics of an orderly, energetic, and assiduous direction of your faculties to some useful employment, and that is opposed to everything like idleness, remissness, or frivolity. Seek an intelligence that possesses the subjective power, keenness and skill, of a mind developed by much thought—deep, energizing, soul-expanding thought—as well as the objective knowledge of the world, that combines the active use of learning and mental power with mere passive intellection. Live a religion that consists not in forms and ceremonies, nor in pronouncing the shiboleths of sect, nor yet in mere cold and formal virtue; but a religion that develops itself in unfeigned love for the true, the right, and the good—that fills the soul with love, praise, and adoration to God.

Industry is one of the great secrets of success. In the every-day realities of life, it is more potent than genius. You will find no rivals so powerful, so difficult to overcome, as hard-fisted, sun-burnt, brow-wrinkled, sweat-producing industry. Constantly do something. Strive to be useful in some well-arranged employment—an employment that will tell directly upon your mission.

Intelligence—progressive intelligence—must every be your watch-word. Be not content with whatever intellectual light and strength you may now possess, nor with any given amount, however great; but ever strive after a healthy, developing, progressive activity of the mind. Ever strive to unfold new fields of thought. Unless you continue to make new acquisitions, your present light will soon become dim, and your strength weakness. Study self, in order to know yourselves and your powers—study man in your daily intercourse with the world, and as revealed in history, in order to know your relations and duty—study nature and revelation, in order to know Deity and his laws, with your own consequent obligations. Religion must be the ground work, the motive power, of your lives. It should furnish the great inducements to all action. All other motives are low and debasing, compared with those derived from this source. As there are no motives so ennobling, so there are no rewards so great as its reward. Religion is the only perfect shield against temptation and sin—the only panacea for the trials and woes of man. Nothing, save religion, will fully satisfy the aspirations of the immortal mind. It is the great want of humanity. You cannot fulfill your mission without it. Strive then to possess religion, as the chief good. Let its paths be your paths—its joys, your joys—its promises, your promises—and its rewards, your rewards. Let it be as a golden chain, binding you to the throne of God. Seek pardon and protection from sin in the atoning blood of Christ, and the agency of his Spirit.

Without industry, religion and intelligence are but inert realities, effecting nothing—without intelligence, religion is prone to degenerate into fanaticism or superstition, and industry is but brute force, as apt to pull down as to build up, as apt to kill as to cure—without religion, industry and intelligence are but menial servants, yielding their service to sin as readily as to righteousness; but where the three are harmoniously and properly united, they become a hundred-eyed Argus, joined with a hundred-handed Briarius, impelled by heavenly power, strong for the tearing down of sin, ignorance, and superstition, and wise for the building up of truth and righteousness. In your preparation, therefore, as well as in action, be careful that you preserve this trinity. You are now in the habit-forming, molding, developing period of life. You retrospect a past that is but brief—you look forward to the future of a life that is yet in its morning. Let not your morning sun be obscured by the clouds of ignorance, unrighteousness, or inglorious inactivity. Many of you have, doubtless, commenced the cultivation of your minds for usefulness; but, while you sedulously train your intellect, be careful that you as sedulously cultivate your moral natures—for what you are in this respect in your preparation, you will pretty surely be in your future activities. He that neglects the means of grace when young, will be very likely to do so when old. That youthful Christian who is preparing himself for his mission, and yet is irregular and indifferent in his attendance on prayer-meetings, Bible-classes, and indeed all of the ordinances of the church, will doubtless continue thus irregular and indifferent through life. Such may become intellectual giants, but will ever remain moral pigmies. Most of the religious defections and Sabbath apostacies, so frequently occurring, take place with such individuals. In forming your habits for life, whatever may be your more particular pursuit, strive to be industrious, intelligent, and religious—aiming at perfection in all, but ever remembering that the greatest of these is religion. While you remember that punctuality, order, and energy, are the precursors of success—that thoroughness and prudence should mark every act—that integrity, kindness, and constancy, should characterize your intercourse with the world—recollect, also, that your course should be pursued with the disinterestedness inspired by love to God and man, as the ruling motive of all action—that, with eternity in view, you should labor, in all things, for the glory of God and the good of man. While you use the past for reflection and instruction, use the present for preparation or action. Leaving the future to the guidings of Providence, ever strive to make the best of the powers and privileges which God has given you. As you mingle in the scenes of a fallen, sinful world, labor to exert your influence for good, to establish righteousness, to kindle a truthful light for the future. While trial, opposition, and persecution, may await you, remember that you are but walking in the footsteps of the great and good of every age. Recollect, also, that you have friends that will watch over you and sympathize with you, not only of this world, but those also of the spirit world, who will regard your course in life with an interest none can feel, save those who have entered upon the realities of eternity, and know the importance of time as a probationary period. God himself is marking every act of yours with infinite interest, and will grant unto those living acceptably in his sight a crown of righteousness, and a seat at His right hand forevermore. Labor, then, with such a mission before you—such motives to actuate you—such witnesses to sympathize with you and assist you—such rewards awaiting you—and may Heaven grant that your lives may be devoted to the advancement of intelligence, truth, and religion—and that your death may be that of the righteous. MACOM.

THE NEW YORK ANNIVERSARIES.

Several of the National Benevolent Societies held their Anniversaries in New York last week. Our limits will not admit of copying in full the newspaper reports of those meetings; but we give abstracts of the reports and the statistics of several of the Societies this week, and will endeavor to do the same by others next week.

American and Foreign Christian Union.

The receipts of this Society during the year ending April 1, were $67,507, being an advance on the preceding year of more than $11,000. The expenditures were $65,742, being $10,000 more than they were in the year ending April 1, 1852.

The number of missionaries, missionary agents, and other laborers in the service of the society, at home and abroad, was 118 last year, being eight more than were employed in the year preceding.

American Anti-Slavery Society.

This Society, which was last year driven to hold its anniversary in Central New York, because no suitable building could be obtained in this city, held its meeting this year in the Chinese Building, on Broadway. It was addressed by Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Edmund Quincy, Miss Lucy Stone, Wendell Phillips, and Henry Ward Beecher.

N. Y. State Colonization Society.

The 21st Annual Meeting of this Society was held May 10th, at Metropolitan Hall. The receipts last year were $17,000. Among the speakers at the Anniversary were Capt. Foote of the U. S. Navy, Rev. Dr. Van Arsdale, and Rev. Dr. West.

American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews.

The external prosperity of this Society has been greater the past than during any former year. The whole amount of receipts into the Treasury has been about $13,269 03. The following statistics will show the external progress of the Society during a few years past. The whole amount of receipts for 1849 were $3,221; in 1850, $5,600; in 1851, $10,968; in 1852, $12,634; and in 1853, $13,269 03.

The Gospel has been preached to the Jewish people throughout the United States during the year, more extensively than ever before. The missionaries have preached to them in the highways, in their dwellings, in their synagogues, and in Christian churches, in fifteen cities, besides in large towns and villages.

There have been employed nine regular missionaries, besides from five to seven colporteurs, all converted Jews.

They have met with a cordial reception by the Jewish people, and their messages of consolation and salvation have commanded respectful attention.

There is evidently a prevailing feeling among the Jewish people in this country, that modern Judaism cannot supply their spiritual wants. They are looking for something more rational and substantial.

The fruits of missionary labor are on the increase. They have been the past double in number over the preceding year. Fourteen Israelites, through the instrumentality of the Society, have publicly professed faith in Christ, and the prospect is that twice this number will follow their example during the next year; for there is now a large number of persons under instruction, many of whom are hopefully converted.

The seventy-nine Israelites who have publicly embraced the Christian religion under our auspices during the three years past, are sustaining a creditable profession in connection with the respective churches to which they belong.

The encouragement to labor in this field, if the converts seem to be few, are great, arising from the fact that a large number of the converts themselves are qualified for useful spheres of missionary labor. Of the converts of the past year, one is now employed as a missionary teacher to the colored population in the West India Islands. Another is a colporteur, and a third, formerly a Jewish Rabbi, is a missionary to the Jews.

Of the 29 converts mentioned, one is a missionary, two are colporteurs, two are students preparing for the missionary work, and one a missionary teacher. Of the 15,000 or more Jewish converts in the world, about every one in 60 is a preacher of the gospel.

The Board have had no fund appropriated for temporal relief; but by other means, eighteen proselytes have been placed in circumstances where they are obtaining a comfortable livelihood.

Other missionary efforts abroad in Europe, have met during the past year with their usual success. There are very few obstacles in the way to preaching the Gospel, distributing Bibles, books and tracts, among the Jews in any part of the world.

The new Board of Directors will enter upon their duties with nine regular missionaries, located in New York, Albany, Syracuse, Rochester and Buffalo, Cleveland, Baltimore, Nashville, New Orleans, Charleston, Savannah and Columbia, Hartford and New Haven. Also, with two regular colporteurs, three students who act as colporteurs, and a general missionary agent.

American Home Mission Society.

This Society has had in its service the last year, 1087 ministers of the Gospel, in 27 different states and territories; in the New England States, 313; the Middle States, 215; the Southern States, 12; and the Western States and Territories, 547.

Of these 584 have been the pastors or stated supplies of single congregations; 288 have ministered to two or three congregations each; and 215 have extended their labors over still wider fields.

Ten missionaries have preached to congregations of colored people; and 71 in foreign languages—17 to Welsh, and 46 to German congregations; and others to congregations of Norwegians, Swedes, Hollanders, Swiss and Frenchmen.

The number of congregations and missionary stations supplied, in whole or in part, is 2160.

The aggregate of ministerial labor performed, is equal to 878 years.

The number of pupils in Sabbath-schools, is 72,500.

There have been added to the churches, 6079, viz: 3362 on profession, and 2717 by letter. Fifty-six missionaries make mention in their reports of revivals of religion in their congregations; and 426 missionaries report 2888 hopeful conversions.

Forty-seven churches have been organized by the missionaries during the year; and 39, that had been dependent, have assumed the support of their own ministry.

Fifty-four houses of worship have been completed; 50 repaired; and 66 others are in the process of erection.

Eighty-nine young men, in connection with the missionary churches, are in preparation for the gospel ministry.

Receipts, $171,734 23. Liabilities, $185,184 01. Payments, $174,439 14—leaving $10,744 77 still due to missionaries for labor performed; towards which there is a balance in the treasury of $7,202 15.

The receipts exceed those of the preceding year, by $11,671 99; 22 more missionaries have been in commission; 16 more years of ministerial labor have been performed; 212 more congregations have been blessed with the preaching of the Gospel; and 6000 more children instructed in Sabbath-schools. The large reinforcement sent out to the Society's missions on the Pacific coast constitutes also a grateful, as it is a most important feature, in the advances of the year.

American Tract Society.

New publications 157, in ten languages, of which 23 are volumes; total publications 1832, including 374 volumes; total approved for circulation abroad, in about 119 languages and dialects, 2801. Of the American Messenger over 200,000 are issued monthly; German Messenger, 25,000; Child's Paper about 250,000. Illustrated Christian Almanac for 1853, 250,000; Christian Almanac in German, 30,000.

Circulated during the year, 9,173,640 publications, including 881,766 volumes, and embracing 268,902,315 pages. Total since the formation of the Society, 137,893,480 publications, including 8,416,830 volumes. Gratuitous distribution for the year, in five thousand and thirty-six distinct grants by the Committee, 63,989,976 pages, besides 8,234,865 to life directors and life members; value over $48,000.

Receipts, in donations, including $17,967 27 in legacies, $147,374 64; for sales, including periodicals, $237,252 21; total, $385,286 68. Expenditures, for publishing books and periodicals, $232,211 29; for colportage, $79,711 29; cash remitted to foreign and pagan lands, $20,000; total expended, $385,075 07. Due for printing paper, $16,670 29; due on the Society's house, $43,192 91.

Whole number of colporteurs who have labored the whole or part of the year, 642, of whom 117 were devoted chiefly to the German and other foreign population, and 126 were students from colleges and seminaries. Of these 642, 41 labored in New England, 195 in the Middle States, 395 in the Southern and Western, and 11 in Canada. Families visited during the year, 530,758; conversed or prayed with, 260,414; found destitute of all religious books except the Bible, 54,600; destitute of the Bible, 28,243; Roman Catholic families visited, 43,824. Total families visited by the Society's colporteurs, 3,252,089.

The $20,000 remitted in cash has been distributed to thirty-nine missions and stations as needed to meet the wants of the ensuing year; $4300 to Continental Europe; $1800 for countries on the Mediterranean; $3800 for Southern India; $3000 for Northern India; $4600 for Burmah, Assam, Siam and China; and $2500 for the Sandwich Islands, Africa, and our own Aborigines.

A New Society.—Anniversary week has been signalized, among other things, by the formation of a new religious Society, which will hereafter probably hold an important and conspicuous position among the anniversary meetings. It has been formed under the auspices of such men as Dr. Bacon, Dr. Dwight of Portland, Rev. Mr. Storrs of this City, and other well-known clergymen and laymen. Its establishment was contemplated previous to the assembling of the late Convention at Albany, but the results of that convocation have made its formation almost imperative. Its aim is to provide a bond of union and acquaintance among Congregationalists, and to promote the interests of the Congregational polity, without, however, any legislative or ecclesiastical power, it being a purely voluntary organization. It will gather a large library and have its consulting rooms in this City, but will be a National Society, taking the name of the "American Congregational Union." It will be put at once upon a permanent basis and exert a wide influence.

Mrs. Stowe in England.—The visit of Mrs. Stowe in England furnishes a text for many newspaper articles, in which the condition of the working people of England is compared with the slaves of the United States. This subject is commended to Mrs. Stowe's attention by the Glasgow Examiner, and she is invited to exercise her rare powers upon it—to write, in short, a history of British slavery. The Examiner says:—

"No doubt she may see here cases of wretchedness worse than any she ever saw in her own country; she may see cases of self-enslavement more self-degrading than are to be found in the new world; she may see men who may rival Haley or Legree in brutality of nature; she may see classes toiling late and early for a miserable pittance; but she will not see the sacred ties of nature rudely torn asunder by the hands of man; no honest and affectionate husband dragged from the embraces of an affectionate wife; no daughter severed from her parents, and exposed for sale in the market-place; no servant, male nor female, lashed, knocked down, nor even treated unjustly, without the arm of the law being brought down upon the offender. The poorest cabin in our land is as sacred in the eye of the law as the most stately mansion, and the poorest menial is in this respect on a level with the lord. The man is not worthy of his nature, who would not prefer scanty fare and such freedom to the position of the most pampered slave in all Kentucky."

A World's Temperance Convention.—A meeting of friends of a World's Temperance Convention, was held in New York last week. At an early stage of the meeting, the question of "woman's rights" was introduced, by several members of that sex, who desired also to be members of the meeting. As their request was not granted, they withdraw, and held an independent meeting. The regular meeting voted that "it is expedient to hold a World's Temperance Convention in the City of New York, to commence on the 6th of September next, 1853, and to continue in session four days; and that a Committee of one from each State be appointed by this meeting to issue a call for such a Convention."

Revival at Mystic Bridge.—A correspondent of the Independent says that a revival of religion, of marked solemnity and power, has been enjoyed in the Mystic Bridge Congregational church, Stonington, Ct., under the ministry of Rev. W. R. Long. It commenced about the seecond week in February and continued with unabated interest for about six weeks. About one hundred were seriously impressed, and about sixty are indulging the hope of the convert. Thirty-five have made a profession of religion, and several more contemplate it in due time. The converts embrace some of the most intelligent and enterprising citizens in the place, heads of families, sons and daughters in the morning and meridian of life, and generally take an active part in the converts' meeting. "This is the Lord's doing; it is marvelous in our eyes."

Converts in China.—The London Missionary Society's native church at Shanghae consists of twenty-one members, who give "a good hope that they have been brought to an experimental knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus." Four converts, all men, and one of whom accompanied Mr. Abeel on his return to this country, were admitted to the privileges of the church at Amoy, in July, 1852.

Hindoo Hostility to Christianity.—The Hindoo press in Madras is constantly bringing out publications against Christianity, from the showy handbill to the bound volume. The men engaged in this work avail themselves largely of the labors of the enemies to the gospel in Christian lands. The newspapers in the native languages, which have many readers, also contain attacks on the Scriptures.

The Memorial.—The sixth number of the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial will be published in a few days. It will contain an autobiography of Eld. Wm. B. Maxson, the conclusion of the history of the Newport Church, and a missionary article. A portrait of Eld. Maxson will accompany the number.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Rev. Dr. Peck, of the Baptist Board, writes that "Greece is open for evangelization. It is open in law. Nothing forbids the preacher to go where he will, declaring the Gospel of God. The Greek priest may preach the Gospel; the foreign teachers may preach it. There is nothing, civil or ecclesiastical, that forbids even the Greek church to rebuild on the foundation of the apostles and prophets. There is nothing in public sentiment that precludes, in fitting times, and in right ways, the preaching of the Gospel."

The effort undertaken some time ago, for the purpose of endowing the Union Theological Seminary in the city of N. Y., has been so far successful that the sum of one hundred thousand dollars has been subscribed toward a permanent Fund for the benefit of that Institution. Of this sum James Boorman, Esq., contributes twenty-five thousand dollars, to be appropriated for the endowment of the Chair of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology.

The anniversaries of the Baptist Missionary Union, and of the American and Foreign Bible Society, will be held at Albany, N.Y., the former on the 16th, and the latter on the 17th. Drs. Wayland of Rhode Island, Sheldon of Maine, Church of Montreal, Oncken of Germany, and others, are to be present.

Dr. Devan has resigned his connection with the American Baptist Missionary Union. He has, however, proposed to the executive committee to return to the field after passing a few months in the United States, and to superintend gratuitously the operations of the mission in Southern France.

Rev. Dr. Taylor, Professor at the Theological Seminary at New Haven, was presented with a donation of $1000 cash, together with clothing, merchandize and sundries to a considerable amount in addition, by some of the ladies belonging to his congregation, on April 11.

Sixty thousand dollars have recently been subscribed for the endowment of professorships and the extinguishment of a debt which has been weighing heavily for some time upon the University in this city.

The Journal and Messenger says: "We do not believe the salaries of Baptist ministers in Ohio and Indiana average, in the aggregate, over $200 to $300, if as much. Scores do not receive over $100."

The Freeman's Journal announces that the Romanists are about to start a daily paper in this city, and calls upon the faithful to contribute the funds necessary for that purpose.

California News.

One week later news from California, being to April 16th, has been received.

The steamship S. S. Lewis went ashore north of Bolinos Bay, at 3 o'clock in the morning, and it being found impossible to get her off, all the passengers, (400 in number,) were safely landed, together with nearly all the baggage; but the vessel, a considerable quantity of specie, and the ship's stores, would prove a total loss. The loss was estimated at $200,000.

The steamer Jenny Lind exploded her boiler as she was going from Alviso to San Francisco, having 130 passengers on board, mostly from San Jose. Fifty or sixty persons were terribly scalded, of whom 20 were dead, including seven children and one whole family, Noah Ripley, his wife and three children. The survivors and the remains of the unfortunate victims were taken on to San Francisco by the steamer Union.

The mining intelligence is of a favorable character.

The Senate had rejected the bill for the extension of the city front of San Francisco, previously passed by the House.

The act extending the provisions of the Fugitive Slave Law for another year, also an act for the incorporation of railroad companies, had passed the Legislature.

European News.

By the steamers Hermann and Atlantic at New York, and Cambria at Boston, we have eleven days later news from Europe.

Mrs. Beecher Stowe was at Edinburgh, having been to Aberdeen, where she was received with the usual enthusiasm.

A later account says that Mrs. Stowe has been entertained at a dinner by the Lord Mayor of London, and is now the guest of the Duchess of Sutherland.

The Jewish Disabilities bill was thrown out on the second reading in the Lords.

The Canadian Clergy Reserves bill had passed.

From France there is little or no news of importance, except the Empress' severe indisposition.

A dispatch from Jerusalem, under date of March 27th, mentions that the mission of the London Protestant Association had fallen out with the Jewish Authorities. On Palm Sunday, a fight occurred in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, between the Greeks and Armenians, and several persons were wounded.

In Russia, a bill to exclude Jews from all public employments, has passed one House, and is causing an excitement in the country.

An insurrectionary attempt was defeated at Frieburg, Switzerland, on April 22, promptly and bravely by the civic and militia force. It was the act of a restless party which inherits the misfortunes of the defeated Sonderbund. Its ranks are recruited almost exclusively from the peasantry, and its policy is inspired by the Jesuits. Its immediate object in this movement was to rid the canton of Freiburg of a radical executive, and constitution founded on universal suffrage; its remoter aim, to encourage similar demonstrations throughout Switzerland, and, at the head of an important canton, to concur with Austria in restoring the ancient reign of exclusiveness in the affairs of the Confederation. The leadership of the corps destined to effect this revolution was entrusted to M. Perrier, a Federal Colonel, who, in the war of the Sonderbund, acted as Aid-de-camp to Gen. Maillardoz. Under his conduct, a band of peasants marched upon Freiburg at the hour of four in the morning of the 22d; and, having secured the two upper gates of the town, occupied the Jesuits' College before a sufficient number of citizens could be aroused to offer any effectual resistance. The civic guard and the militia, however, responding to the first cry of alarm, were soon upon the scene, and at once assailed the avenues of the College. A sanguinary but brief conflict now ensued. M. Carrari fell in front of the College, pierced with several balls, and two of the militia were also killed. The bravery of the assailants, however, prevailed. All the avenues of the building were carried at the point of the sword, and a large number of the insurgents were compelled to yield themselves prisoners.

From China, we have reports that the revolution is advancing with rapid strides and has already become of the most formidable character. It originally commenced in Kwangsi and Kwangtung, the two most southerly provinces of the Empire, in the latter of which the City of Canton is situated. Thence it has penetrated northward for seven hundred miles and upward, till it has reached the Yangotse, the great river of China, and down its valley toward and near to its mouth, till the insurgent army, fifty thousand strong, has entered and taken possession of the great city of Nankin, containing above a half million of inhabitants. The rebels may thus be said, if our accounts are true, to hold possession of the very heart of the Empire. Their entry into the City of Nankin was made on the 19th of February.

Awful Disaster at Sea—200 Lives Lost.—Capt. Stetson, the mate, second mate, and six of the crew, of the ship William and Mary, of Bath, Me., were picked up on the 3d instant, and brought to New York by the brig Reuben Carver. They report the loss of their ship on the morning of the 3d inst., near the Great Isaacs, with about 200 passengers. On the previous evening she struck a sunken rock, knocking a hole in her bottom, which let in water so fast that the pumps could not keep her up. Two of the boats were stove after launching; the other two took on board as many of the crew and passengers as they could, and a few minutes after leaving the ship, she went down. The William and Mary left Liverpool for New Orleans March 24th, with 208 passengers, including their cook and steward, who nearly all went down in the vessel, together with two of the seamen, and the ship's steward.

Another Railroad Accident.—On Monday evening, May 9th, an accident occurred on the Paterson Railroad, near Jersey City. It seems that on that day the time tables, hours of starting, and so forth, were changed; and of this change it was the duty of the Superintendent at the Jersey City Depot, Mr. Green, to inform every engineer and conductor leaving the depot with a train. The western emigrant train set out in the evening without this indispensable information being communicated to Mr. W. G. Gale, its conductor; the engineer had the new time table, but Mr. Gale says he had not, and was not even aware of its existence. Accordingly, he put forward his train, though the engineer contended that it was out of time, but yielded on the conductor's positive and repeated assertion that it was not, supposing that his own watch was out of order, and not imagining that the conductor was ignorant of the change in the table. Proceeding slowly, they presently met the Express train coming east at full speed, and a collision ensued, resulting in the mutilation of four breakmen, two of whom are probably dead.

Calamity at Buffalo.—For some time past workmen have been engaged in remodeling a large four story granite front building on the west side of Main-st., Buffalo. In doing so it became necessary, for the purpose of converting two into one, to remove partition walls, and to substitute pillars for the support of the roof and upper stories. On Sixth-day afternoon, a little before 6 o'clock, while from twenty to twenty-five men, carpenters, masons, and laborers, were engaged in various parts of the building, it was observed to give way, and the roof, the inner and rear walls, came down with a tremendous crash, burying nearly all within the building in the ruins. A few, however, who were near the street, in the lower story, escaped. The concussion was so great that it shook the surrounding buildings and was felt at a considerable distance. Up to Sabbath evening six dead bodies had been taken out, and three more were known to be under the building.

SUMMARY.

We have accounts of the ravages of the yellow fever in Rio de Janeiro. It has been especially fatal to foreigners recently arrived in the country, although many of the old residents as well as natives of Brazil have been carried off by its violence. Among the victims are Mr. Henry Southern, the English minister to Brazil, and Mr. Simonin, the Austrian Secretary of Legation, a young man in the flower of his youth. The people in the house where he lived were so frightened that they forsook him and left him entirely to the care of the negroes. The most severe suffering has been among foreign seamen, including both masters of vessels and crews.

The Inspectors of the State Prison at Sing Sing, have volunteered to furnish a handsome monument, suitably inscribed, and made of the white marble which is found on the Prison grounds, that village, for the purpose of marking the place where Andre was captured. They agree to prepare the monument and deliver it at any time which may suit. They ask no compensation; all they ask is, that the inhabitants of Weschester shall secure the grounds for the monument, and erect the same upon the "Andre Ground," which is in the village of Tarrytown.

At noon last Sunday, the Sardinia sloop-of-War San Giovanni arrived in N. Y. harbor. She is a fine vessel, mounting 24 guns, and brings 84 Italian exiles to our shores. These patriots have been forcibly expatriated by the Government of the King Victor Emanuel, for their republican opinions, and their supposed sympathy with the late attempt at revolutionary rising in Lombardy against the Austrian oppression.

The death of Calamme, the celebrated landscape painter, is announced from Geneva. He had been ill for a long period, though he did not permit the disease from which he suffered entirely to suspend the efforts of his pencil.

A hurricane passed over Batavia on Tuesday, May 10, causing considerable injury to buildings and shrubbery, besides wounding one or two persons.

Judge Burnet, of Cincinnati, died on the 10th of May.

The Coroner's Jury in the case of the Norwalk Railroad Accident, by which forty-six lives were lost, have rendered a verdict, that the persons deceased came to their death through the negligence and recklessness of the engineer, who ought to have taken notice of the signal that warned him of the danger, and who ought not in any case to have been driving the train along the curve over the bridge at so rapid and reckless a rate. The engineer, it is said, is likely to die of the injury which he received in leaping from the engine.

We learn from The Presbyterian, that Miss Mary Murray, of this City, has gratuitously conveyed, for a Presbyterian congregation, organized, or to be organized, in connection with the Presbytery of New York, and to be known as the "Murray Hill Presbyterian Church," a sufficient portion of land on the north-west corner of Thirty-fourth-st. and Fourth-av., for the erection of a church, Sunday-school and lecture room. The land is valued at from $25,000 to $30,000.

Hon. Jacob Ten Eyck, President of the Madison County Bank, and for the last forty years a respected resident of Cazenovia, with his wife, accompanied an invalid daughter to Havana last winter, in the hope of improving the daughter's health. From Havana they visited some other of the West Indies, and had reached Charleston, S. C., on their return, when both father and mother were stricken down by Billious Fever, and died a day or two since, leaving their sick daughter alive among strangers.

The ship Hermann, Skinner, from Baltimore for San Francisco, stopped at Juan Fernandez March 27, for water, and was to sail again the next day. The captain writes that "he arrived there after a very tedious time, but without any accident, and was much surprised to find a fine settlement of about 300 persons, headed by a Governor. They were very kind, and furnished the ship with supplies reasonably." This ship, on a former voyage, stopped at the same island and found no inhabitants.

The Boston Railroad Times, estimates that the Railroads now in the course of construction in America and Europe will require for completion not less than two millions and four hundred thousand tuns of iron, sufficient to occupy all the rolling mills in the world engaged in the manufacture of Railroad iron at least six years. Of course, it will give equal employment to the iron furnaces of the world. The Times reckons that Great Britain furnishes three-fourths of the iron manufactories, and the United States, France and Belgium the other fourth.

The clipper ship Flying Dutchman, Hubbard, Commander, left New York for San Francisco (on her first voyage) 15th of Oct. last, arrived in San Francisco, discharged her cargo of some 1,600 tuns, and sailed again for New York, at which port she arrived on Sunday, after a fine run of only 85 days, thus accomplishing the voyage in the unprecedented short space of six months and 23 days, the shortest time ever made.

The proprietors of the Metropolitan Hotel, New York, have recently put in operation a Telegraph connecting with House's and others, in Wall-st., for the convenience of such of their guests as desire to use that mode of communication. A person stopping at that House may now communicate with half the civilized world, (in this hemisphere,) without leaving his room.

The Bonds and Mortgages belonging to the Farmers' Bank of Onondaga were sold at auction on Thursday last, and brought $13,505. The Evening Journal says: "The Bonds and Mortgages thus sacrificed were deposited with the Superintendent for $50,317, which sum was represented by men of high character and judgment to be but two-fifths of the value of the lands mortgaged."

The "wreck of matter" at Norwalk was on Friday collected into a pile and consumed with fire by order of the New Haven Railroad Company—leaving no vestige of the late calamity. The engine was lifted out of the mud, and placed upon the track, by a powerful steam derrick brought from New York. It was but little broken.

The last arrival from Europe brings us the intelligence of the death of the venerable German Poet, Ludwig Tieck, which took place at Berlin, on the morning of April 28. Tieck has been justly called "the last of the great poets of the great poetic age of Germany." He was born in Berlin, May 31, 1773, and had accordingly nearly completed his eightieth year at the time of his death.

In New York, on Monday morning, May 16th, several men engaged in demolishing a building in Wall-street were bruised by the falling of a floor on which a large amount of rubbish had collected. One man was killed, and another seriously injured.

At Washington, May 14th, a messenger of the General Post Office, named Robert A. Hawke, in a paroxysm of insanity, cut his wife's throat, so that she died in 20 minutes. He also attempted to take his own life.

A dispatch dated Norfolk, Tuesday, May 10, 1853, says: A great tornado has passed over the lower part of Princess Anne County, Virginia. A number of houses were swept off, and everything was prostrated. Four lives were lost, and many persons wounded.

A dispatch dated Chicago, Tuesday, May 10, 1853, says the sale of Canal Lands commenced yesterday. Prairie land bringing $4 and $5 per acre, and timbered $8 and $16, being an average of 70 per cent. above the apprizement.

The governor, executive council, and many of the senators and representatives of the state of Massachusetts, have subscribed one day's pay to aid in the completion of the Washington monument.

The crops in South Carolina, Georgia and Alabama have been suffering from a long prevailing drought. At the latest advices copious showers had visited large portions of those States, putting a new face upon the fields.

John Farrar, LL. D., late Hollis Professor of Mathematics in Harvard University, died at his residence in Cambridge, on Sunday last, the 8th inst., aged 73.

The Dutch galliot Margaretta, De Groot, from Rotterdam, just arrived, has on board 222 packages for the New York Industrial Exhibition.

The Illinois Canal Lands sold at $4 to $16 per acre, the latter for timber lands. This is largely in advance of the estimate.

The New Bedford Standard mentions the arrival in that city, per steamer Massachusetts, of a gentleman fifty years old, a native of Nantucket, on his first voyage to the main-land. It is refreshing to record such an instance of staying at home in these restless times.

It is stated that the Grand Jury of Tazewell County, Virginia, have presented the Legislature of that State as a nuisance! This is returning the law "to plague the inventors," in a most extraordinary manner.

The Rhode Island State School Commissioner's Annual Report makes a return of 26,200 pupils connected with the Public Schools of that State, with an average attendance during the past year of 18,772.

Dr. Burnside, of Toronto, has given £6,000 to Trinity College, £4,000 in cash, and lands adjoining the College grounds valued at £2,000. The gift was formally consummated upon the venerable donor's 73d birth day.

The New School Synod of Peoria, Ill., has been endeavoring to raise on loan $10,000, without interest, for the benefit of feeble churches engaged in building houses of worship, &c. Half the amount has been secured.

Rev. Thomas F. Davis, of Camden, having received a majority on the twelfth ballot of the votes of both houses of Delegates, was declared Bishop elect of the Diocese of South Carolina.

The Artesian well, now being bored in Charleston, S. C., has already attained the depth of 1061 feet. Major Walden, the engineer, is confident of ultimate success in his search for water.

A train of cars on the New Bedford and Taunton Branch Railroad was thrown off the track last week by the breaking of an axle. Nineteen persons were injured, of whom two were seriously, perhaps fatally, injured.

Maj. Gen. Scott is now located in his private house, No. 128 West Twelfth-st., near Fifth-av., N. Y. The old hero is warmly welcomed to his new residence by the people of New York.

From a list we see there are 117 newspapers printed in the State of Indiana—more than in all the world before the American Revolution.

A hundred mill-girls, selected by an American speculator in Glasgow, have sailed from the Clyde, to commence a new cotton mill at New York.

The steamship Albatross went ashore on the 18th ult. upon Cabezas reef. The passengers lost all their baggage, and blame Capt. Greene for the disaster.

The Hospital for the Insane, at Pepperel, Mass., with the out-buildings attached, and also the dwelling and school-house of Rev. Mr. Perry, were recently destroyed by fire.

A woman named Violet Proctor died in the New Bedford Alms-House, on Sunday, at the advanced age of one hundred and eight years.

The demand is good for Land Warrants, and quotations are improving. Thompson quotes them: 160 acres, $170 and $175; 80 acres, $85 and $87; 40 acres, $43 and $44.

The loss of property by the destruction of steamers in the Pacific, during the past three years, amounts to considerably over $1,000,000.

Eastern Association.

THE Seventh-day Baptist Eastern Association will hold its Seventeenth Anniversary with the Church at Piscataway, N. J., commencing on the fifth day of the week before the last Sabbath in May, (26th day of the month,) at 11 o'clock A. M. Preacher, Charles M. Lewis; alternate, Daniel Coon. Committee on Business—D. Dunn, W. B. Gillett. The Executive Committee convenes for its annual session, at the same place, at 9 o'clock A. M. on Fifth-day.

Central Association.

THE next meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association is appointed to be held with the Church in Scott, Cortland Co., N. Y., commencing on the fifth day of the week before the second Sabbath in June, 1853, (9th day of the month.)

Western Association.

THE 18th Annual Meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association is to be held with the Church in Independence, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the fifth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath in June, 1853, (23d day of the month.)

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Titsworths & Dunn, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Miscellaneous.

Extraordinary Criminal Case.

From the Buffalo Courier.

There are circumstances connected with the late murder of Beatson, in Ohio, whose supposed murderer, Parks, was recently arrested in this city, that mark it as one of the most extraordinary affairs recorded in the history of crime. There is more about it that evinces a long contemplated, adroitly planned robbery, and a calm, unfaltering determination to commit murder merely for gain, than can be found in any volume of "Remarkable Criminal Trials" that has been published.

Less than a year ago, Beatson, the murdered man, Parks, his supposed murderer, and a person named Gee, came over together in the same ship from Europe. Beatson and Parks had comparatively little money, while Gee was known to have several hundred dollars. With this he came to Erie County, and deposited a portion of it ($600) in the Buffalo Savings Bank. The place of its deposit became in some manner known to Beatson, who resolved if possible to obtain possession of it; but how to accomplish that object was a matter not so easily determined. A plan, however, was devised and its execution at once entered upon.

Ascertaining that there was in the city a young Englishman, who also came over in the same ship with Gee, Beatson found him out and introduced himself as Gee's brother, and succeeded so admirably in convincing his new acquaintance that such was the fact, that he went with Beatson to the bank and introduced him as such to Mr. Howard, the Secretary. Beatson then produced a letter, previously prepared, of course, by himself, purporting to be written to him by Wm. Gee, stating that he (W. G.) had just purchased a farm near Buffalo, had paid $300 on it, and needed $600 more in gold; that he was unable to come in person to Buffalo and draw it from the bank, in consequence of having been injured by a kick from a horse, and had therefore deputed his brother to get it for him. Under this state of things, being properly introduced—Wm. Gee being unable to draw a check—the story seeming altogether probable, and circumstances not suggesting any suspicion, the Secretary concluded to pay the $600, and drew a check for that amount on Oliver Lee & Co.'s Bank. Before delivering the check, however, the Secretary wrote a receipt for the money, which the supposed "brother" was requested to sign.

This Beatson declined doing, alledging as a reason that he could not write. He did, however, make his mark, which was witnessed by the person that introduced him. Putting the check in his pocket he proceeded to Oliver Lee & Co.'s Bank, presented it to Mr. Mercer, the Teller, saying he desired to have gold. Mr. Mercer replied that he could not pay gold on the check, except at the usual premium, or unless Mr. Howard should request it. The cool individual said he would take it back and have Mr. H. do so. Back he went to the Savings Bank. Mr. Howard assented to the request, and inserted in the check "pay in gold," and with this Beatson returned to the O. Lee Bank, obtained the gold, and took his departure. The next that was heard of him was, that he had been murdered, and that Parks was arrested for the crime.

Another curious incident in this singular history is, that there was found in Beatson's pocket, after his murder, a paper stating that the gold belonged to Wm. Gee; but not more extraordinary than what follows: After Park's arrest, this paper came into the hands of the District Attorney of Summit Co., Ohio, where Parks is now undergoing trial. That officer immediately wrote to Wm. Gee, making inquiries in reference to Beatson, as to the truth of what was stated in the memorandum; but just before the letter was received, Gee was killed by the accidental discharge of a gun. When the letter had arrived it was opened by the landlord of the tavern where Gee had been staying, who at once hastened to the city to ascertain the facts.

Strange indeed is the web of human life. Of these three persons, who a few short months before were fellow-passengers on the voyage to this country, one robbed a bank of $600; he in turn is murdered by a companion, and a third, whose money was the cause of it all, is hurried to another world by the accidental discharge of a gun. The supposed murderer is now on trial for the offense, and the evidence against him is said to be very clear.

A Printer's Declaration.

In a late number of the Carlisle Democrat, the editor, General Boyer, releases himself from those who have taken his paper, without ever intending to pay for it, in the following novel and bold Declaration:—

When, in the course of rascally events, it becomes necessary for a hungry and half-starved editor to dissolve the friendly bands which have connected him with a band of villainous patrons(!) and to assume, among mankind that separate and just station to which his poverty and independence of spirit entitle him, a decent respect for the opinions of his honest supporters requires that he should declare the causes which have impelled him to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that editors were created like other men; that they were endowed with certain propensities; that amongst them is a disposition to eat, drink, and keep themselves comfortably clad. To secure these events laws were instituted among men, securing to the creditor his honest and just dues; but when a villainous $300 exemption act becomes destructive to these ends, it is our right to institute a new system, laying its foundations in such principles as to us shall seem most likely to protect us in future from all fraud and imposition. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that friendship long established should not be severed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience has shown that editors are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when long-standing abuses, and a total disregard for every generous feeling, having in view the same object, evinces a design to drive to absolute starvation him who has labored for years to supply them with their mental aliments, it is his right, it is his duty, to repudiate friendships, and provide new guards for his future security. The history of these outlaws, is a history of repeated injuries and insults, all having in direct object the pecuniary distraction of their best friend and benefactor. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid mind.

They have refused time and again to pay us the first continental "dingbat," although repeatedly called upon to do so.

They have refused to supply us with wood, corn, oats, potatoes, beans, peas, pork, and poultry—although our appeals were long, loud, and pathetic—fixings inestimable to us, and formidable to rascals only.

They have refused to supply us with any aid whatsoever, whereby to facilitate our business operations, thus rendering us in a measure incapable of pursuing with a light heart and buoyant spirit our legitimate business; the office, in the meantime, exposed to all danger of an invasion from without and convulsions within.

They have combined with others, to subject us to the worst grievances, foreign to our good nature, and unacknowledged by our laws.

For cutting off our trade with paper makers.

For imposing debts upon us without our consent.

For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of market money.

They have plundered our pockets, cheated our creditors, "burnt our fingers," and done sundry other cruel and barbarous acts, unworthy the character of gentlemen.

In every stage of these oppressions, we have petitioned in the most humble terms; our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated neglect and consequent injury. Men whose characters are thus marked by acts which may define a set of plundering scamps, are unfit longer to be the recipients of our favor.

Nor have we been wanting in attention to these men; we have warned them from time to time, through the paper, and by letter, of a "Black List." We have reminded them of our circumstances—of our emigration and settlement in Carlisle. We have appealed to their sense of justice and magnanimity, and then we have conjured them by all the ties of good fellowship, to send us the "Almighty Dollar," or we would inevitably interrupt our connection and correspondence with them. But they have been deaf to the voice of justice, reason, and humanity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we do all others like them, scamps when they don't pay us; when they do, the best of clever fellows and good citizens.

We, therefore, the editor of the American Democrat, appealing to all honest men for the rectitude of our intentions, do in the name and by the authority of our "better half," and "nine small children with one on the bosom," solemnly publish and declare, that these men are, and of right ought to be, stricken from our list of subscribers; and that all connection between them and us is, and ought to be, totally dissolved. And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of our honest patrons, we solemnly pledge renewed exertions to our pen, our paste-pot, and noble scissors.

Theory of Epidemics.

Some able writers have endeavored to account for the manner in which diseases undermine the vital powers, by a theory not unentitled to attention. As the air is ever more or less filled with the emanations of putrifying animal and vegetable matter, they have assimilated the action of these particles upon the blood to that of yeast on wort. By the fermentation produced by the yeast, the sugar is changed into alcohol. It is, apparently, predisposed for the change; and the slightest assistance it receives enables it to unloose the former union of its particles, and to enter into a wholly new state of chemical combinations. Just so, animal matter, floating in the air in the chemical state of change called putrescence, if not sufficiently diluted, is capable of throwing the blood, with which it may come in contact, into an analagous state of fermentation. Thus, of course, it totally alters its nature, and renders it incapable of fulfilling its proper functions. Other writers have supposed that the air, when rendered impure, becomes overloaded with multitudes of microscopic insects, who attack the human body, as smut attacks corn. Conceive a minute fungus, whose pores, floating in the air, form the germs of epidemic disease. But all the various theories brought forward proceed from the assumption of a vitiated state of the atmosphere.

To understand the full force of these theories, we must remember that the human body is a wonderful combination of innumerable particles, all placed in different degrees of chemical affinity or antagonism to each other, and only held separate, and in their proper relations, by the inscrutable powers of vitality.

Port wine will tan and convert into a species of leather, the stomach of a dead person; and the gastric juices, that possess the power of dissolving not only animal substances, but even metals, fail to injure, in the least degree, the vessels with which they are in constant contact, as long as life holds its full dominion. How wonderfully does one single fluid—the blood—in its passage through each organ of the body, yield to the different secretions required to enable it to fulfill its proper functions—supporting, at the same time, that very vitality which it at once sustains and serves! Life has no sooner departed, and let loose all the different atoms of which our earthly tabernacle is formed, than they engage in the great strife that eventuates in its total dissolution. As in a moral sense, the spirit is ever at war with the inclinations of the flesh; so, too, in a physical sense, the different elements of the body are only preserved in their integrity by the despotic control of vitality.

These considerations derive some title to notice, from the undoubted fact that epidemics are almost invariably accompanied by an extraordinary development of insect life, and seldom fail also to produce most remarkable effects upon the lower animals.

We have often heard of the "showers of blood" that are said to have preceded pestilence, striking terror into the mind of the vulgar. The showers of colored rain are almost invariably caused either by infinite multitudes of microscopic insects, or sometimes by the growth of a species of fungus. The cliffs between Cape York and Cape Dudley Digges, in the Arctic regions, are sometimes covered with snow of a bright crimson color.

Whether these crimson globules belong to the animal or vegetable kingdom, has been much disputed; but Sir John Ross, the discoverer, insists that they are a vegetable production, and has called them the Ureda navatic. He has so styled them because he maintains they belong to the genus Ureda, vulgarly known as the smut in wheat. It is evident that the phenomenon of colored rain cannot occur, particularly in our latitudes, without some extraordinary atmospheric changes, of which philosophy has failed to discover the causes; but it frequently takes place on the eve of a pestilence. Dr. Barker has recorded the fall of an ink black fœtid rain, (doubtless animalcular,) near Carlow, on the 14th of April, 1849, at a period coincident with the outbreak of the cholera in that town.

This belief in a connection between both circumstances, also prevails extensively in India; and, though perhaps it receives an undue amount of credence, the popularity of the theory vouches for the frequency of the coincidence. An immense development of insect life also preceded the pestilence at West Barbary, in 1799, and the same circumstance elsewhere has been frequently witnessed and recorded. [Dublin University Mag.

Colored Daguerreotypes.

We find in a late number of the Scientific American, an article by James Campbell of Dayton, Ohio, giving the results of some experiments made to produce colored Daguerreotypes, from which we make the following interesting extracts:—

M. Becquerel and Niepec de St. Victor have proved, that if chloride of silver containing a slight trace of copper be exposed to the prismatic spectrum, or to rays of different colors, while undergoing his reduction, it is susceptible of coloration after a protracted exposure. From this it would seem, that this process might be much accelerated, if we were careful to aid nature in her operations, instead of trying mere haphazard experiments, not based on rational theory. I will show by a few experiments, that this may be done, and to avoid being too prolix, will, at present, speak of the chloridated silver plate, unaccelerated by iodine, bromine, fluorine, chrome, or their compounds.

If the plate, covered with the enameled chloride of silver prepared by Niepec's process, be exposed to a current of hydrogen while receiving the image, the process will be much accelerated, and the image will be impressed in from half an hour to an hour; according to the amount of gas passed into the camera, the light, temperature, electric state of the atmosphere, &c., instead of requiring from three to five hours, as in the original process, and the colors of the picture will be impressed on the plate in all their original beauty. This experiment may be very easily performed, it only requiring a few grains of zinc in a small vial, containing dilute sulphuric acid. The vial and its contents may be placed in the camera, and the hydrogen being nascent, is in its most active state, and as it is perfectly transparent, it permits the light to act on the plate, while it is itself engaged in reducing the chloride, which it is only capable of doing in sunlight.

The hydrogen, probably from its affinity for oxygen, hastens the decomposition of the organic matter, and assists in reducing the chloride, thus acting as a deoxydating and dechloridating agent. There is, however, sufficient hydrogen contained in the combined organic matter, to effect the reduction of the chloride; hence it is probable that the excess merely hastens the decomposition.

Following this train of investigation, I have tried many other reducing agents, both liquid and gaseous. The most important liquid agents tried have been, the proto-sulphate and nitrate of iron, ferocyanide of potassium, protochloride of tin, and the fluorides of potassium and sodium. The principal gaseous agents tried are hydrogen, alone and in combination with carbon and sulphur, ammonia, sulphuric ether in vapor, chloroform vapor, sulphuret of carbon, chloride of sulphur, hydro-sulphuret of ammonia, and sulphurous acid. As very remarkable results followed from the application of the gases, I will speak of them more particularly. Sulphurous acid has a strong tendency to abstract oxygen from organic bodies; it also unites with chlorine in sunlight, and so do light and heavy carburetted hydrogen, the latter, indeed, without the influence of light. Sulphurous acid abstracts oxygen from organic bodies, with which it combines, forming sulphuric acid, and sulphuric acid renders chloride of silver unchangeable to light by destroying the organic matter with which it is combined. I hence inferred, that it might be used for the double purpose of reducing and fixing the picture. That it is a powerful accelerator is certain; the fixing requires further experiment.

Pictures may be obtained with this gas in half an hour, by passing it nascent and in sufficent quantity in the camera, and the colors are preserved. There is, however, sometimes a little sulphur deposited under the enamel, which gives the light parts of the picture a yellowish cast. This color may sometimes be removed by heating the plate. Carburetted hydrogen acts still quicker, probably from the free carbon which results from its decomposition being a powerful reducing agent, and as the carbon is not left under the enamel, it probably passes off under the form of the volatile chloride of carbon. I obtained one picture in five minutes, by passing into the camera the gases generated from the distilling alcohol and sulphuric acid in a retort. The gases formed were olefiant gas and sulphurous acid, mixed with a little light carburetted hydrogen and sulphuric ether. The colors were very fairly represented, but not as good as I had previously obtained; I considered this experiment as very encouraging, but having only lately tried it, have not repeated it by itself without the agency of electricity.

As electricity is a powerful agent in decomposing chemical compounds, it might be naturally inferred, that it would aid in this process. I have often tried it, but without, until lately, any important results. Dry chloride of silver is not decomposed by electricity, yet its decomposition by light and other agents may, by it, be much accelerated, and I did not at first use a sufficiently powerful current. I now render the plate a part of the conducting medium which terminates at the positive pole, and terminate the poles in water, to which some saline constituent has been added, and by the decomposition of the water am enabled to judge of the power of the current. By using the gases at the same time that the plate is thus excited, I have been enabled to take pictures in from four to five minutes, which would otherwise require from three to five hours for their production. These pictures are developed under a hard, tough enamel of chloride of silver, cannot be rubbed out by the fingers, and will even bear considerable buffing, and, if the enamel is thick, are improved by the operation. I have not been been able to permanently fix the picture, but it will keep a long time, if not exposed too often and too long to the light. From the above experiments it seems that a prolonged exposure is not necessary to produce coloration, hence agents of great energy may be employed in reducing the chloride.

That coloration may be produced, it is impotant, I think, that the picture, by whatever process it is taken, be positive and complete on its removal from the camera. For fixing, it is important that all the organic matter be destroyed, and then, I believe, it will be fixed. I am at present engaged in experimenting with iodine, bromine, fluorine, sulphur, chrome, and copper, and their compounds, deposited on the silver plate by electric action, or otherwise, but have not, as yet, any results sufficiently matured to publish, though I have produced coloration. Great care is requisite in preparing the enameled plate of chloride, and some experience is required to judge at what state of its preparation it is most sensitive to light; yet any artist can, after a few experiments, prepare it.

Alharra.

The Washington Union contains a communication from Henry R. Schoolcraft, Esq., descriptive of a section of country which is known by the name of Alharra. He says it is an attractive, well timbered and fertile area of country lying immediately west of the Rocky Mountains, in mild, temperate latitudes to which, for the purpose of distinct allusion, he applies the above aboriginal term. This area is about 50 miles broad, and lies parallel to the Rocky Mountains for a distance of several hundred miles. It gives rise to both of the main and numerous sub-affluents of the Columbia River. It is a high plain, which is cut through by these affluents, of a most fertile character, bearing trees, and in some places high grass; and while the streams create abundant water-power for lumber and grain mills and machinery, they are free, or nearly free, from inundation of their banks. This district probably comprehends twenty-five thousand square miles, and if its capacities of production have been correctly estimated, would sustain a population greater than some of the Eastern and Atlantic States. According to the recent act organizing the Territory of Washington, it lies chiefly, if not wholly, within the boundaries of this new Government. It is altogether a genial country, and seems destined to form a link of connection, by ordinary means of transit, with the Missouri Valley, through the Yellow Stone. It may be noticed that while the eastern foot of the Rocky Mountains presents vast sand deserts and buffalo plains, the fertile lands in this area reach to the very tops of its western eminences.

New Way to Make Mirrors.

The Prattsville Advocate states that on a recent visit to Rev. L. L. Hill, the alledged inventor of daguerreotypes colored by the action of light, Mr. Hill showed him a new way of making mirrors. He says: "Mr. Hill took a small glass, such as daguerrians use for covering their pictures, and in forty seconds it was transformed into a perfect mirror—perfect in every respect. We kept an eye upon it the whole time; the process was fully explained, and the result cannot be excelled. In his mode of 'silvering glass' there is not a particle of the usual amalgam of tin foil and quicksilver, but it is composed wholly of pure and unadulterated silver. The discovery was made while he was experimenting on glass, with a view of adopting it to Helio-cromy, never dreaming of its beautiful application to the manufacture of mirrors. The expense of manufacturing mirrors, by this new durable method, will not, we think, exceed half the cost of manufacturing the kind now used; besides they are always perfect, and no art of man can deface them, without breaking them to ieces. We hazard nothing in predicting that it will create an entire revolution in the art of making mirrors, and that in a few years, at most, there will not be a mirror, of the kind now used, to be found in the country.

French Marriage Brokers.

A late Paris letter says: "I have wondered how matrimonial agents—those people that advertise desirable husbands and wives, comfortable settlements in life, dowries, and amiable tempers—manage to make both ends meet. A Commissary of Police has just arrested an extensive dealer in this way, and the secret has leaked out. He advertised himself as corn doctor to all the crowned heads, and sold patent medicines. He was also an agent for marriages, and had a fine lot of young ladies, with dowries varying from 20,000f. to half a million. He had upon his books the names of daughters of members of the Academy and Senate, of a Marshal of France, and sundry German Princesses. Gentlemen that applied for wives paid an entrance fee, and in the course of the negotiation sundry other claims, in all a considerable sum. When it became necessary to bring the affair to a conclusion, a quantity of faded lovettes, with a parcel of elderly females acting as their mothers, were introduced, and the applicant was only too glad to make good his escape. He generally abstained from making the swindle public, for fear of being laughed at. The investigations that have been commenced will probably lead to the breaking up of all the matrimonial offices in Paris."

A Machine for Reporters.

In September, 1850, John B. Fairbanks, Esq., then a resident of this county, now of New York City, took out a patent for an invention calculated to enable any man who can move his hands rapidly in a vertical direction, to report a speaker, in full, with ease and certainty. It is operated by keys, which by their movement connected with stenographic type, imprint a new alphabet of short hand characters upon paper. The alphabet contains only five elementary characters, and by combinations of these, all the other letters, together with numerous word-signs, are made. The fingers and thumb of one hand are sufficient to operate five keys, which constitute the alphabet, and to make innumerable changes upon the same, so that one hand can write one row of signs upon the paper, while another set of five keys under the other hand can, at the same time, be made to write another one. It is really gaining the use of both hands at once in writing stenography, and the hand will certainly not so soon grow weary of simply striking those keys, as of constantly pushing a quill, which those who have tried it well know is worth all it comes to. The Finances of Connecticut.—The Message of Gov. Seymour represents the financial condition of Connecticut as very satisfactory. There was paid into the Treasury during the year ending March 31, 1853, from various sources, the sum of $150,650, which, together with the balance on hand at the commencement of that year of $39,130 03, makes a total of $189,780 03. The expenditures for the past year amount to $135,104 09. There is included in this sum, the item of $8,013 33, paid in full of the State debt April 10, 1852, and payments on account of legislative grants to the Reform School, and for other purposes, $13,268 61, which, if deducted from the above amount, will leave the ordinary expenditure at $113,822 15, being a small increase only over that of the preceding year.

The following statement shows the condition of the School Fund:—

Balance on hand April 1, 1852, $10,143 84. Collected to March 31, 1853, $143,693 69—total $153,837 53. Amount of dividends paid to schools during the year ending March 31, 1853, $135,407 32. Expenses $3,499 66. Outstanding loans of revenue $6,800. Cash on hand March 31, 1853, $8,130 55. The number of children enumerated during the year is, 96,382—dividend to each scholar $1 35.

Sir John Franklin.—A correspondent of The National Intelligencer narrates an interesting case, in which an American missionary, named Bird, on the coast of Syria, was befriended by the lost navigator, Sir John Franklin. A servant of Rev. Mr. Bird having thrown a stone and hit a soldier, who attempted to rob his master's orchard, the missionary himself was accused of the offense, arrested, and most cruelly used by the rough soldiery. The American Consul interfered, and demanded satisfaction of the Government, but the result was only protracted negotiations. Sir John Franklin, in command of a British frigate, having heard of the case, repaired to Beyroot, the scene of the occurrence, and before saluting his own consul or his flag, received on board the American Consul, saluted the American flag, and demanded of the Government instant punishment of the soldiers. This was granted without delay, and carried into effect in the presence of Sir John and the Consul.

VARIETY.

Among other articles of antiquity lately sold in London, was a silver watch, presented to the Whalley family by Oliver Cromwell; £5 10s. An episcopal ring, of the tenth century, found at Armagh, engraved and ornamented, was purchased by Mr. Turnal for £17. A piece of ring money, ornamented, £4. A silver book-case or cover, very finely worked was purchased for £17. A Persian seal inscribed "Joseph begs the grace of the most high and merciful God for everlasting happiness," and three others, in onyx, 12s. A stone, "celt" from the county of Meath, Ireland; 10s. 6d. A pair of ancient spurs £2 7s. Eight flint arrow heads, found at Clough, 10s. An ancient Irish drinking cup of wood, from Cavan, Ireland, 12s.

Taking the cube yard of gold at £2,000,000, which it is in round numbers, all the gold in the world at this estimate might, if melted into ingots, be contained in a cellar twenty-four feet square and sixteen feet high. All our boasted wealth already obtained from California and Australia, would go into an iron safe nine feet square and nine feet high. So small is the cube of yellow metal that has set populations on the march, and roused the world to wonder.

The fast trains on the Hudson River and Central line of Railroads now run from this City to Buffalo in 14 hours, including half an hour at Utica for dinner. At Buffalo immediate connection is had with the boats for the West and with the Lake Shore Road. The fare on this route has been put down between Albany and Buffalo to $6, so that passengers by boats reach Buffalo from this City at an expense of $6 50, and by Hudson River Railroad at a cost of $7 50.

We find in the Lawrence Journal the following account of the late accident at Sharon, Potter county, Pa.:—We regret to learn by telegraph, that on Thursday evening last the roof of the rolling mill in Sharon took fire, and while a number of the workmen were on it endeavoring to extinguish the flames, the roof fell in, and several persons were killed and others badly wounded.

The slaving bark Lady Suffolk recently succeeded in landing, near Mantanzas, a cargo of six hundred slaves. The departure of this vessel from Cuba, for the coast of Africa, caused much talk some time back. She was built at, and sailed from, Baltimore, with an American captain and crew, who, on her arrival in Cuba, were discharged, and replaced by a Spanish captain and crew, and shortly after sailed for Africa.

The effort which was begun a year ago, to raise $150,000 for the purpose of endowing the Union Theological Seminary in this city—the subscriptions to be binding when $100,000 was secured—has met with noble liberality. By means of several very liberal subscriptions made within the past week, the sum of $100,000 has been secured.

The Courier, of Buffalo says: "By the New York and Erie, and Buffalo and New York City Railroads, we were last evening, at 20 minutes past 8 o'clock, put in possession of the New York papers of yesterday morning. The train left New York at 6 o'clock and made the trip in fourteen hours and twenty minutes.

Leahey, the recusant monk of La Trappe, who has been on trial in Portage City, Wisconsin, for the murder of B. Manley, has been found guilty of the charge, and sentenced to be imprisoned in the State Prison for life. Leahey killed Manley in August last, on pretence that the latter had been guilty of improper conduct with Leahey's wife.

The warrant of the Governor for the execution of Arthur Spring on the 10th June, was read to the condemned man by Sheriff Allen. He manifested not the slightest concern, and professed his readiness to die immediately, but asseverated his innocence and the guilt of his son.

On Monday afternoon, May 2d, Mr. John Murkin, a grocer at No. 293 Bleecker-st., N. Y., and Mrs. Juliana Kemp, were killed by being thrown with great violence to the pavement from a wagon loaded with furniture, upon which both of them were sitting.

CHINA MISSION.

The following extracts are made from a letter of Bro. Carpenter, dated Shanghae, Dec. 24, 1852:—

Our preaching in the Chapel we have now all on the Sabbath. We have been in the habit of ringing the bell only on that day, in order to make the Sabbath more distinct in the minds of the people. The bell, we find, makes quite a difference in our congregations. And after some experience in trying to increase the number of exercises, we have made up our minds that, at present, we can do more good by confining our preaching in the Chapel to the Sabbath day. We have a discourse, and frequently some additional remarks, on Sabbath eve. In the morning, at nine o'clock, we have a Bible Class, embracing Bro. Wardner's household and mine. At ten o'clock, another discourse; at three o'clock, another; immediately after which we have another Bible Class. This is conducted in the presence of the congregation, and thus far seems to possess quite as much attraction as the preaching exercises; for the congregation invariable increases during its progress. On Fourth-day evening, we have a prayer and conference meeting, in which one of us four is expected to make some leading remarks, adapted either to our case as preachers, or to us as a church, or to the non-professors present. Then there is opportunity for any one to speak. This last meeting is held at the house of Bro. Wardner.

In these various ways light is steadily increasing. But, for four of us, this makes a very small amount of preaching. We are thinking of opening another place for preaching soon.

Since I last wrote, I have been to Sa Hway Jau four times, and generally had good attention, from twenty to forty persons being present. The people there, as elsewhere in China, are much addicted to a play resembling (I think) the chess of foreigners. It is, however, a species of gambling; cash, and sometimes dollars, being at stake. I generally find them thus employed; and sometimes it requires a little time for them to wind up a game, and get ready for hearing a discourse. But they are almost always polite enough to yield sooner or later.

For the last six days, I have sought and obtained opportunity, daily, to hold forth the word of life in what are termed the "tea gardens" of Shanghae. The grounds are spacious, and it is a place of great resort for all classes of persons at leisure, whether they reside here or in distant parts of the country. There are the spacious temples of the city god and other gods, toy shops, picture shops, crockery shops, and a multitude of spacious tea shops, with several thousands in them sipping their favorite beverage, and discussing whatever topics interest them most. I generally commence a conversation with some individual, and if I find him sociable, we are soon surrounded by a group of a hundred, more or less, anxious to hear. At the close, I give to some one the copy of Mark or Matthew, which I happen to have in my hand, and we part in friendship, to meet, perhaps next day, perhaps not till the general judgment.

You see, dear brother, that much of our work is sowing broad-cast the precious seed. O when shall we return with rejoicing, and bringing our sheaves with us? I am thankful for the privilege of preaching Christ to this people. It is good for me, whether it benefit them or not. And I feel that I am only magnifying the grace of God, when I say that I feel a growing interest in this work. O that He would bow the heavens, and come down, for the salvation of this people.

On the 11th inst. there was an eclipse of the sun, visible in the eastern part of this continent. At Pekin the obscuration was 985 parts in 1000. At Shanghae 861, and farther south less. Dr. Macgowan, at Ningpo, was so thoughtful as to get out a large sheet illustrative of the phenomena, also explanatory and hortatory. Thinking it right, and conducive to the object of our mission, to show the heathen that science is the handmaid of true religion, I had one of these handbills pasted up on our gate-post next to the street, where it was read by hundreds, both before and after the eclipse. Also, on the day preceding the eclipse, I threw open the doors, and, with the aid of the Tellurian, illustrated, in the presence of all who chose to come in, the cause of day and night, heat and cold, the changes of the moon, the eclipses of the sun and moon, changes of the seasons, &c. Next day was Sabbath. The day was clear and fine. The obscuration of the sun commenced a little before ten o'clock, A. M. But the Chinese seemed to have no way of viewing it, except with the naked eye. We got through our morning discourse, before the diminution of light was much perceptible. Then, by the aid of smoked glasses prepared the day before, we gave a thousand persons, or more, the opportunity of satisfying themselves that it was no ravenous beast gnawing at the sources of light and heat, and to be frightened away by the sound of gongs, but that the moon in her regular course had got in between the sun and the earth. All enjoyed the privilege of looking through the glass; some few expressed gratitude, and many thought the dark-colored glass a wonderful contrivance. Upon the whole, I hope a good influence was left on the minds of some.

Again we have been reminded of the instability of the things that now are, and directed to give all diligence to secure an inheritance in that kingdom which cannot be shaken. We have been visited by another earthquake, more severe and of longer continuance than the one which happened on the 13th of Nov. 1847, of which we informed you. It was in the stillness of the evening, and at just eight o'clock. The moon, five days old, was casting her mellow light across the dusky walls of Shanghae. Our household had just been together to listen to the inspired word, and offer up our evening prayer and thanksgiving, too little sensible, however, of our dependence on the Most High for safety through the night. We were sitting quite at ease in our room, when suddenly the house began to shake, and as if some very heavy person was jumping to and fro. In doubt for a moment what was the cause of this motion, these doubts were soon put to flight by such an increase of the jerking motion of the house, as to ring the door-bell, and, as we afterwards learned, to stop the clock.*

In this dense part of the city, we could think of no place outside that promised more safety than to remain where we were. Our emotions may be better imagined than described. But after about half a minute, the motion began to subside, and gradually died away, and we are left to inform you of our safety, instead of your learning from some chronicler of events, that Shanghae had been overthrown. At Manilla, about two months ago, I learn there was a more severe one, killing some of the inhabitants. The Lord reigneth; let the earth rejoice.

* Most of the clocks in town were stopped. But our house seems not to be injured at all. A few Chinese houses fell down.

REGENERATION.

In compliance with the invitation of "T. B. B.," to make some reply to what he writes on the subject of Regeneration, I take the liberty to offer a few remarks.

With him I would reverently bow to the righteous sovereignty and supreme agency of the Almighty in the accomplishment of the new birth. It is to be lamented, however, that men unskillful in dividing the word, often present this great subject in a partial and unguarded manner; thus driving their hearers on the rocks and quicksands of Antinomianism. I am aware that the murmurers against Him who has mercy on whom he will have mercy, and hardens whom he will, may find the chief source of their discontent in their own opposition to the character of God. Many will continue the inveterate foes of Jehovah, though Paul and Apollos should persuade them to become reconciled. But notwithstanding this spontaneous fruit of the human heart, it must not be left to ripen into open rebellion, with only a mere exhibit of its own corruption and utter helplessness, while the hand that is extended to drag the sinner from the pit is made much less prominent, and the earnest, alarming, and most affectionate calls of the Saviour dismissed with a few cool remarks. The most severe and awful truths of the gospel, not spoken in love, nor imbued with its spirit of good will to man, lose their persuasive power, and leave the heart cold as the rocks of Zembla, where suns,

> "Pale suns unfelt, at distance roll away,
> And on the impassive ice the lightnings play."

The most objectionable idea of T. B. B., and what strikes the mind as a dangerous error, is the safe and comfortable condition in which he places those who have not made God their peace. It may be truly said, by the advocates of "Doubting Castle," that some there are, who rejoice in sparks of their own kindling, boasting of a hope that is fallacious. On the contrary, there are true Christians, who through some blindness, (God only knows the cause,) go on desponding, if not despairing—disown the Saviour, and the grace he gives them. Such faith, if faith it may be called, gives not glory to God. The best of men may be in heaviness, and even left to darkness and temporary desertion, but seldom continue in this deplorable state. The earnest exhortation to the full assurance of hope to the end, our brother appears to deem superfluous, but leaves the trembler, condemned by the law, to hug his chains—to reject the timely reprieve, and the friend who has purchased it at so great a price? The songs of deliverance and shouts of victory pain his ear. His fellow prisoners have escaped, but being flattered into self-complacency, he congratulates himself that, though guilty in some respects, he is at least more modest and unobtrusive, more humble and gentleman-like, than the boasting, noisy disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ. S.

MY PHILOSOPHY.

Bright things can never die,
E'en though they fade;
Beauty and minstrelsy
Deathless were made;
What though the summer day
Passes at eve away;
Doth not the moon's soft ray
Silence the night?
Bright things can never die,
Saith my philosophy;
Phœbus, though he pass us by,
Leaves us the light.

Kind words can never die,
Cherished and blest;
God knows how deep they lie
Stored in the breast;
Like childhood's simple rhymes,
Said o'er a thousand times,
Aye, in all years and climes,
Distant and near.
Kind words can never die,
Saith my philosophy;
Deep in the soul they lie,
God knows how dear.

Childhood can never die—
Wrecks of the past
Float on the memory
E'en to the last;
Many a happy thing—
Many a dasied spring,
Flow, on Time's ceaseless wing,
Far, far away.
Childhood can never die,
Saith my philosophy,
Wrecks of our infancy
Live on for aye.

Sweet fancies never die,
They leave behind
Some fairy legacy
Stored in the mind—
Some happy thought or dream,
Pure as day's earliest beam,
Kissing the gentle steam,
In the lone glade;
Yet, though these things pass by,
Saith my philosophy,
Bright things can never die,
E'en though they fade.

ANNIVERSARY STATISTICS.

We give this week more statistics of the Benevolent Societies, the Anniversaries of which have recently been held.

American Female Guardian Society.

This Society held its nineteenth anniversary in the Church of the Puritans, Union Square. Rev. Dr. Ferris presided. The attendance was not full, and those present were almost exclusively ladies. About 75 children were present from the Home of the Friendless, in charge of Miss Lucas, teacher.

After the introductory prayer, and singing by the children of the Home, the Treasurer's Report of the Society was read. It states the receipts and expenditures as follows:—Subscriptions for The Advocate, $6,254,65; donations for general purposes, $500,26; books, papers and tracts, $393,53; rent of room at the office, $100; donations and subscriptions for the support of the Home of the Friendless, $5,523,88. In the expenditures were the following totals:—Printing and publishing, $5,593,79; incidental, $777 82; aid to poor, including poor widows, $173,08; paid to Matron of the Home, $4,292,74; balance in the hands of Treasurer, $1,934,94. Total, $12,772, 37.

The Annual Report of the Society was read by Dr. Ferris. The statistics of the publishing department are as follows: Semi-monthly issue of The Advocate and Guardian, 16,000; Annual Report published, 5,000; two editions of "Saw Up and Saw Down," 1,000 each; "Letters to a Young Christian," 3,000; Tracts, Petitions, &c., 130,000 pages, making in all, 788,000 pages spread before the reading community during the current year. Number of new subscribers received, 1,575. Life members received during the year, 107 by payment in full, and 62 by payment in part—whole number 169. Through the agency of the publishing office, more than two hundred needy women and children have been located in good families in the country. The statistics of the Home for the Friendless are as follows: Whole number of inmates admitted since the Institution was opened in 1847, has been 3,493. Received the past year, adults, 370; children, 187; total, 557.

American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

A meeting on behalf of this Board was held May 13, at the Metropolitan Hall, Broadway. The Secretary read the Report, of which the following is an abstract:—

At the annual meeting of the Board in September last, 163 ordained Missionaries, 26 unordained Missionaries, and 213 female assistant Missionaries, were reported as connected with the 26 Missions and 111 Stations in the different fields in which its operations are carried on. Since that time intelligence has been received of the removal, as we doubt not, to a higher sphere of service, of eight of that number—four Missionaries and four female assistants.

Within the same period five have returned from a visit to this country, and 39 new laborers have been sent forth; of whom, one Missionary and his wife have gone to the Cherokees, five male and eight female assistant Missionaries to the Choctaws, six Missionaries and eight female assistants to the Armenian Mission, and the remainder to Syria, Assyria, China and Ceylon.

The number now appointed is nine Missionaries and three Assistant Missionaries; several of whom expect in a few weeks to embark for their respective fields of labor beyond the sea. Seven of the missions are among the Aborigines of our own country. Unfavorable circumstances prevent the bearing of the Gospel into the necessary contact with them for the full exhibition of its power among the Ojibwas and the Dekotahs, but in other tribes it is proving itself adequate to save a race which human philosophy and mere worldly philanthropy leave to hopeless degradation and destruction.

The annual report continues at some length to give an account of labors of Missionaries among the Choctaws, Cherokees, Sandwich Islands, Micronesia, China, Ceylon, Greece, Thessalonia, &c. The spiritual reformation in the corrupt Christianity of the Oriental Church, which has been so auspiciously commenced through the labors of the Syrian, Nestorian, Assyrian and Armenian Missions, is moving steadily onward with augmenting power.

In these Missions, from 16 central stations, and 22 out stations, the word of hope is sounded forth by 46 Missionaries, 54 female Assistant Missionaries, 26 native male helpers, and 51 native female helpers, making a total of 177 laborers. The report concludes with the following statement of the finances of the Society:

The receipts into the Treasury for the nine months ending April 30, were $209,352 85, being $1,709 69 less than for the same period of last year, including the $15,855 08 given for the debt, or $14,145 23 more, excluding donations for the debt. To realize the $300,000 necessary for the current financial year, $30,000 per month for the remaining three months are needed.

The American Bible Society.

Thirty-two Agents have been in service, two of whom, Rev. Dr. Bond of Missouri, and Rev. Mr. Pollock of Alabama, have died much lamented.

Of the books sent forth, more or less have gone to every State and Territory, to the West Indies, to Brazil, to all the Republics of Spanish America, to Turkey, India, China, and to several islands of the Pacific.

Grants of money have been made toward printing and circulating the Scriptures in France and Russia, and at twelve Foreign Missionary stations, to the amount of $24,000.

On the whole, the past year has been one of prosperity to the Society. Much more has been accomplished in preparing and circulating the Scriptures than in any previous year. Yet the managers are deeply convinced that the Society is by no means meeting the Biblical wants of our own or of foreign countries. The limited accommodations of their former house for printing and binding, have tended of late to curtail the Society's operations. But now all impediment of this kind is removed. Books can be made in the new house to almost any extent which may be called for.

Sixty-five Life Directors, and 1,318 Life Members, have been constituted during the year. Sixty-seven new Auxiliary Societies have been formed, most of them in the new States and Territories.

The entire receipts of the year have been $346,542 62, an increase of $37,797 61 over those of the previous year. The number of Bibles and Testaments issued has been 799,370, being an increase of 133,355 copies over the issues of the previous year, and making an aggregate of 9,088,352 since the formation of the Society. Of these issues of the year, 63,772 have been as donations, and very many others sold, to be paid for when resold by the Auxiliaries.

Baptist Home Mission Society.

The twenty-first anniversary of this Society was held on the 13th inst., at the First Baptist Church, Troy, N. Y.

FINANCES.—Balance from last year's account, $6,115 63; cash receipts from all sources, $45,354 93; making the total amount of cash in the Treasury for the year ending 31st March, 1853, $51,470 56. The total amount of disbursements for the same period was $47,004 58; leaving a balance in the treasury at the present time of 4,465 98. The total liabilities of the Society, on the 31st of March, 1853, amounted to $36,007 78; and the available resources at the same period were $8,115 98; showing a balance against the Society at the close of the year of $27,891 80.

SUMMARY OF LABORS AND RESULTS.—The number of missionaries and agents in the employment of the Society the past year, was 179. Of that number, 118 were in commission April 1, 1852. The remaining 61 were new appointments, made at different periods of the year. Three other ministers are under appointment, whose labors commenced after the 31st of March, the close of the year, and are not enumerated with the above. Eight who were under appointment some portion of the year need no further aid from the Society, and cease to be considered its missionaries.

The missionaries have been distributed as follows: In Canada (West) 2; Grande Ligne Stations, Canada (East,) 6; Pennsylvania, 3; Delaware, 2; Ohio, 2; Michigan, 9; Indiana, 35; Illinois, 33; Wisconsin, 36; Iowa, 22; Minnesota, 4; Oregon, 3; California, 3; New Mexico, 4, besides whom, 9 collecting agents have been employed the whole or a portion of the year.

The number of States and Territories occupied is 13. The number of stations and out-stations supplied is 500; and the aggregate amount of time bestowed upon the field is equal to that of one man for 116 years.

The missionaries report the baptism of 1,025 persons; the organization of 59 churches; and the ordination of 30 ministers. Twelve houses of worship have been completed, and thirty are in progress of building.

The Churches, aided by the Society, have contributed to the usual objects of Christian benevolence, $4,298 08, besides about $15,473 for the support of their ministers.

Two of the three ministers under appointment, to commence labors from or after April 1, are designated for Illinois or Iowa, and the other for North Western Minnesota.

American Sunday-School Union.

The Twenty-ninth Anniversary of this Institution was held in Philadelphia, May 17, 1853. From the exhibit made on the occasion, it appears that the principal receipts and expenditures for the year were as follows:—

Receipts, $217,014 63; of which $52,351 58 were donations, and $8,082 67 legacies; $150,875 57 for sales and in payment of debts, &c.; from tenants renting rooms of the Society, $2,353 01; loans received, $3,351 80; balance from last year, $3,073 31.

Expenditures.—Salaries and expenses of 169 missionaries and agents, and donations of books to destitute Sunday-Schools, &c., $60,662 71; for stereotype plates, $4,527 15; copyrights and editing, $2,610 39; engravings, $3,288 07; paper, $47,111 27; printing, $16,193 24; binding, $51,620 73; Bibles and Testaments bought and miscellaneous books purchased to fill orders, $8,721 89; interest on loans, $2,513 17; salaries of secretary, superintendent of book-store, book-keeper, salesmen, clerks and laborers, $9,598 62; maps, coloring, &c., $870 32; Custom-house duties, freight, boxes, postage; &c., $2,823 34; advertising, stationery, fuel, &c., $1,049 66; taxes, insurance, &c., $1,147 52; loans paid, $2,000; miscellaneous items, $5,234 41; balance cash on hand, $115 45.

The Society is now indebted for paper, binding, &c., $27,112 88; which, added to the amount of loans bearing interest, $38,312 09, exhibits a total indebtedness of $65,424 97. The amount of stock of paper and books is $103,241 73.

Sunday-School Missionaries.—One hundred and fifty-seven of these laborers have been employed for various periods of time, in twenty-four different States and Territories. These Sunday-School missionaries have established 1,704 new schools, and have visited and revived 2,398 other schools, altogether embracing 29,997 teachers and 103,350 scholars. They have distributed by sale and donation $38,895 worth of religious books, chiefly for children and youth.

The missionary labors of the Society are entirely distinct from the publishing department. Indeed, the latter is quite subordinate to the former. As a missionary institution, the Society has two chief objects: 1. To open new Sunday-Schools in neighborhoods and settlements where they would not otherwise be established, visiting and reviving old Sunday-Schools; and, 2. To supply them with books for carrying on the schools successfully, when thus begun.

Gratuitous distribution of books, tracts, &c., have been made (including $2,870 96, the details of which are not yet reported,) to the value of $18,401 97, and these, with the charges to the donation account specified in the general report of receipts and expenditures, make the amount expended in missionary and agency labors, and donations in books, during the year ending March 1, 1853, $60,652 71.

Publishing Department.—The value of publications put into circulation during the past year, $150,910 28. The number of new publications 58, of which 44 are for libraries. Of the whole number, 34 are original works, and 24 reprints. The aggregate of new reading matter, exclusive of the periodicals circulated by the Society during the past year, if issued in 18mo. book form, will not be less than 6,200 pages.

HOW SOME PEOPLE TREAT MINISTERS.

It is refreshing, says a corrospondent of an exchange, to read of such facts as were stated in your paper of 19th April, under lhe above caption. Let me add to the catalogue. A pastor in a congregation in Massachusetts, in a sermon on the 10th anniversary of his settlement, discourses thus:—

"From the commencement, and without interruption, there has been on your part, my friends, the most considerate and generous deportment. Pastors and preachers, rather generally and frequently, speak of difficulties and trials, in relation to which I can give them no sympathy. So far as experience is requisite, I can neither appreciate their troubles nor impart counsel or comfort. The privilege of a month's repose was a spontaneous grant on your part; the generous increase of salary was equally an unasked and self-moved act of the society, and that, too, at a time when sickness for many weeks, and even for months, suspended all labor on my part. Let it be stated, also, that no delay occurs in the payment of quarterly installments, and that arrears never exist. It is from the continuance and promptness of the same disposition, that within the last twelve months opportunity and the means of restoration were granted, and that, by the blessing of God, I am before you to-day, to praise him for his goodness and his wonderful works to the children of men. The more private and multiplied expressions of individual and collective regard, cannot be enumerated till the leisure of Heaven give opportunit.y"

Let it now be stated, Messrs. Editors, that the church to which the above pastor ministers is not a large one, having but 272 members (less than several of the churches in Vermont, by the statistics of 1850,) that his congregation is only of ordinary size for Massachusetts, and not overgrown as to wealth, either; but that, along with their liberality to their pastor in his support, to which he testifies as above, he states that in the ten years of his pastorship among them, their "public collections for benevolent objects, including those on sacramental occasions, amount tu $26,241." Here is a fair example to prove that liberality in support of the ministry goes hand in hand with generosity in aid of the efforts of Christian benovolence abroad in the world. People who generously SUPPORT the Gospel, will contribute generously to SPREAD the Gospel.

THE CHURCH ROLL.

A western correspondent of the Watchman and Reflector gives the following account of the practice prevailing in the church of which he is pastor:—

It is a very common rule, that if members are absent two meetings in succession, unless known to be sick or otherwise disabled or absent beyond the bounds of the church, they must be visited by a messenger, the cause of absence inquired into, and they admonished to their duty, if found delinquent. This brings the case before the church at the next meeting, and opens the way for discipline, if the delinquent persists in neglecting the church. But the practical difficulty in such cases has been to keep in recollection each delinquent. The church in which the writer performs some of the duties of pastor, has the following rule of order:—

"During each monthly meeting, the names of the members shall be called over (unless known to be sick, infirm, or being out of the bounds of the church,) and each absentee marked; and each member who is absent (except as aforesaid,) and does not appear and give satisfactory reasons at the next meeting, or in the intervening Sabbaths, shall be visited by a committee, and cited to appear before the church."

This rule works well practically, and often brings to the knowledge of the pastor, deacons, and other members, instances of sickness, and other disabilities, that excite sympathy and claim attention. The church consists of about one hundred and fifty-five members, scattered over a farming settlement of about eighty square miles, but this rule practically keeps the members acquainted personally with each other. The church meetings are held on the first Saturday in each month, and well attended. Previous to the annual meeting in January, a committee take the roll book and investigate the character and standing of each member, and make a specific report to the church. All who have been absent from any cause, living within ten or twelve miles, are visited, and those who are absent on business, whether in California, or any other State, are written to, and inquiry made of their attachment to Christ and his cause, and their manner of life. [An Old Pastor.

DARE YOU DIE?

Christian, ask yourself this question. You must die, and may die very soon. Dare you die to day? Is your house and your heart set in order, so that you can meet your Judge with a smile, and not with fear? Were you to sit at the gate of glory and wait for charges against your life (before your entrance,) would you dare to meet them? Would your children come up and say, he has done his duty to us; his prayers and counsels and life have ever pointed to the path of purity? Would the church testify that you have been faithful to every obligation, and kept your covenant vows with scrupulous exactness? Would your minister affirm that you had stayed up his hands, and ever stood ready to coöperate with him in efforts to save souls? Would the impenitent say, you have not ceased to warn us and beseech us to come to Christ? The Sabbath-school, and the heathen, and the destitute of our land, would they declare that you have done your duty? God has his eye on all these things, and will judge you according to the truth in all of these cases. My brother, have you done your whole duty, so that you can give in your account without fear of accusation in regard to your various responsibilities? Are you worldly, penurious, cold, formal, seldom in the prayer-meeting, morose in your family, careless about the salvation of souls? Oh, how the eye of God will search you, and how you will quail before him! Dare you go into his presence in such a state? Are you in such a state? Then, how dare you die? But you will die. You cannot avoid it. Suddenly, it is likely, you may be called. How dare you live so careless, and hoard up your money without regard to a dying world? You are a steward, and are squandering your Lord's substance. Suppose you should employ a man at $30 a month to manage your business in your absence. On your return, you find that he has neglected your business, rode around in your carriage, spent his time in pleasure and folly, or in hoarding the income of your farm for his own good. You call him to an account, and demand why he has behaved thus, and he replies, just to show you how you treat your God, what could you say? With such treatment, dare you meet your God? If you live thus, dare you die? [Morning Star.

THE PRAYER OF THE RIGHTEOUS.

Some thirty-five years since, there lived a man in the town of ——, in northern Vermont, having a companion and four children of tender age. Their circumstances were not simply humble, but quite dependent on his daily earnings and the scanty products of that uncultivated section of the State. A log cabin was their dwelling. Here he had commenced his manly toils, in expectation of prolonged life, and in earnest hope of years of plenty yet to come. "A man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth his steps." At length he sickened and died, leaving a dependent widow and her more dependent children. But the widow's God still lives, and never forgets the fatherless. Notwithstanding His treatment of them, "His judgments" often become "a great deep." So they were seen to be in the case of those dwelling in that desolate wilderness-home. For scarce had the grave of the father been made, ere the mother likewise fell a victim to the stern archer, leaving all the care of her tender and loved ones to Him who hears "the ravens cry." "And," said the Rev. Dr. C., now of Massachusetts, who, though then living at some distance, was called to officiate at the funerals of both parents, "I was greatly concerned for the orphans, and if ever I prayed, it was for them. A few weeks after the mother's burial, I saw the selectmen of the town, and inquired after the orphans, and being informed that they had all been provided with good homes, I exclaimed, this is wonderful. It has been done so quick." "O," said they, "we remembered your prayer for them." We see how "the effectual, fervent prayer of the righteous availeth." [Puritan Recorder.

BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATION.—There is one unique curiosity at the village of Etretat. At low tide you may see scores of women bearing large sacks of clothes from the town to the edge of the sea. There they dig pools among the smooth and rounded pebbles, and wash until the tide returns. "In salt water?" you ask with wonder. No, in water as fresh as your New England rills—water flowing from the steep lime-hills under a deep mass of pebbly shore. The wavelets sometimes dash the salt foam over the brims of these temporary fountains, but the pure stream soon drives it back, and the fresh, sparkling, fluid crystal flows on. Thus, thought I, as I looked on those pools, does the life of Christ in the heart—the well of water springing up within us—drive back the waves of worldly evil that often for a time dash over into the fountain. It tastes for a moment of the world's great flood, but is wholesome and sweet anon.

DIVINE SOVEREIGNTY.

The sovereignty of God is never more strikingly displayed, than in those instances where he makes the very wickedness of man subservient to his own glorious purposes. The selling of Joseph into Egypt, wherein his brethren "thought evil against him, but God meant it unto good," is a case in point. The crucifixion of our Saviour, in which his murderers did but fulfill the voices of the prophets, is another. Truly, our God is "wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working."

In the exercise of sovereignty, the Divine Being secures the great ends of moral government, notwithstanding the disobedience of the governed. If his creatures refuse to square their conduct by his law, he will in some way, nevertheless, (and no thanks to them,) bring about the end which he contemplates.

Meditating on this point, we have been struck with the fact, that all the great schemes of men for their own personal and pecuniary advantage are eventually made the means of promoting the comfort of others. Men toil with ceaseless anxiety to accumulate wealth. Their object is simply to render themselves comfortable. Yet God requires them to use their wealth in blessing others. "Sell all that thou hast and give to the poor." But obedience to this requirement is the last of their thoughts. Self is all that they look at. They are always looking forward to the time when houses, and lands, and social arrangements, will all be fixed just to their minds. Then they mean to enjoy life. "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." This is the ultimatum, the great end of all their toils and cares.

They intend also, if they should not live a great while to enjoy what they may have accumulated, that their children shall take possession, and enjoy it. "Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue forever, and their dwelling places to all generations; they call their lands after their own names."

Thus, the principles by which they are actuated, and the conduct they pursue, would seem to be a complete frustration of the great purpose of their creation. But mark how the providence of God defeats them. The wealth, which they would not share with others while they lived, is at last made to minister to the necessities of the poor, in spite of all arrangements to the contrary. The labor which each of them was willing enough to spend merely for his own sake, is finally made the means of blessing those who are in want. His property comes into the possession of others. His pains to confine it to his own family are signally defeated. Others enjoy it; and it would seem as if God were determined to make him work for the benefit of others, whether he would or no. God allows him to accumulate, that he may have wherwith to bless and gladden the hearts of his fellow creatures; and if he will not employ his property in this way, but labors in his selfishness to prevent such a result, he, or his children after him, will find that "in the thing wherein they dealt proudly, God was above them."

We see in this an exercise of divine sovereignty. We see God's determination that the selfishness of man shall not defeat his purposes; that wealth shall minister to the purpose for which it was created; and that the great ends of moral government shall not be defeated by the sin of man.

To our mind, this conveys an important practical lesson. It inculcates the wisdom of living for the benefit of others rather than ourselves. It teaches us to find our pleasure in giving rather than in receiving. It shows the folly of endeavoring to thwart the purpose of the Almighty, and that, as the counsel of the Lord alone shall stand, so it is far wiser and better to comply with his requirements at once in regard to the use of what we possess, than to wait till his providence shall wrest it from us, so losing the reward which is bestowed upon them who serve him willingly.

THE WALDENSES.

Rev. J. B. Revel, the Moderator of the Waldensian Synod, is now in this country, for the purpose of making known the state of the Waldensian Church—the open door which God has set before it in Piedmont and other parts of Italy for the spread of the Gospel—and asking the aid of American Christians. During anniversary week, a meeting was held in New York, to consider the subject, when a committee was appointed to prepare an address to the churches, inviting them to aid the work liberally. At that meeting, Rev. Mr. Revel gave the following sketch of the history of his people:—

Before the Reformation, in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, our Church was in a most prosperous condition; we sent missionaries to spread the Gospel all through Italy. In Calabria, in particular, we had seven or eight churches, which were in a most flourishing condition. Our Church was in the heart of the Popish dominions, and received the most fierce persecution; but I suppose that God, to show his power and goodness, preserved us in a most especial manner, and enabled us to bear this persecution with fortitude, and inclined to our assistance the whole of the Protestant Churches in Europe, during the time of trial. From 1691 till 1848, we have been indirectly persecuted by unjust taxation and oppression; not an open oppression, which would excite the sympathies of the world at large, but an indirect and covert one, which made it the more distressing. In 1848, we received from the King of Sardinia our emancipation from this oppression, and a charter securing to us our civil and political rights, and permitting us to worship God according to our consciences. Immediately after receiving this charter, our Church again commenced its missionary career. By the assistance of many friends, General Beckwith and Dr. Gilly in particular, we were enabled to establish a much larger number of schools in our country; and what was more essential to the success of our enterprise, a Preparatory College for Theological students. From the efforts of various pious men in our Church, and from the assistance of Felix Neff, and other friends in Switzerland, our Church revived; and so soon as we received our emancipation, we sent missionaries to Piedmont and Tuscany, and also six young ministers to Florence, to learn the Italian language, that they might become missionaries in that country. Two missionaries were sent to Florence in 1850–51, and so great was their success, that in a short time a very large congregation rewarded their efforts. But the authorities, fearful of their influence on the Romish Church, banished one of them, and imprisoned the other, so that, having now no missionary in Florence, we have concentrated our operations on the kingdom of Sardinia. We founded a mission in Turin, and have erected a church there, which is now ready to be opened. And our cause in Italy is in a most promising state. We have two missionaries in Turin; two in Genoa; one in Nice; one in Cassela; one in Pignerol; and one in Constantinople, among the Italian refugees. We have not sufficient means to enable us to continue this work; and it is necessary that we should enlarge our College, by adding to it a Theological Seminary, with three more Professors; so that we may not be constrained to send our students to Switzerland, Germany, or France, for their Theological Education, but that we may be able to educate them at home; and especially that we may be able to instruct them in the Italian language, as we are called to evangelize in Italy. We are constrained to ask assistance from our friends, to aid us in the erection of our churches, in increasing the number of our Professors, as well as in sustaining our Italian missionaries in their efforts to disseminate the truths of pure Christianity.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Sunday Opening—The Confession and the Bible.

GLASGOW, May 6, 1853.

The Crystal Palace Company's Bill passed the House of Lords this day week. Two of the religious newspapers (the Record and the Guardian) profess great satisfaction that no Sunday clause has been added. The latter even talks as if "the battle had been fought and the victory won." We do not view the matter at all in this light; nor does the church, which continues to promote the presentation of petitions, as before; nor, indeed, do the papers I have named, for they urge continued efforts as still necessary to prevent the dreaded result. In truth, after what the Crown lawyers advised, there was little reason to suppose that the decision of Parliament would be given in any other form than by a separate Bill legalizing the opening on Sunday—perhaps including in the same Act the National Gallery, Museum, &c., as entitled to do the same. That the expectations of the Palace proving a profitable investment are not affected by what has hitherto been done, may be inferred from the fact that the shares of the Company, in the quotation of to-day, are at 15s. 8d. premium. That a Sunday exhibition, in the present state of indifference as to Sabbath observance of any day, would be twice as remunerative as any other day, there seems little reason to doubt. The share market thus becomes somewhat an index of public expectation, more to be relied on, perhaps, than the gratulatory monitions of the newspapers referred to. The church has loved and adhered to her own traditions at the expense of God's law. She has refused to return to "the old paths;" and the hedges of her own planting, we believe, the Lord is preparing to break down, removing thus the obstructions which to weak faith have proved stumbling-blocks for many generations.

Still the church pursues the same course in regard even to other questions, refusing to examine whether she has departed from the faith. Two instances of this kind are presented before us this week. In the Established Synod of Lothian and Tweedale, Mr. J. T. Goodsir appeared as appellant against a decision of the Presbytery of Edinburgh. He had asked the Session of the High Church of Edinburgh, of which church he is a member, to endeavor to show him the harmony of the statements of the Confession of Faith on the subject of justification, with the proof-texts cited, in the original languages of the Scripture. The three courts decide, that there can be no discussion of the question as to the agreement of the Confession with Scripture. The church is bound by it, and those who do not agree with its dogma must leave the communion. Such a principle renders reform of any error impossible—for it is not of the case, (of the merits of which we know nothing,) but of the principle—and may leave nothing but destruction, as the means of vindication of the divine government. The other case is precisely similar, although in reference to a different subject, and occurring in another church. It is the case of Mrs. Mather, carried by appeal to the Synod of the United Presbyterians, and decided by them against her. She has married her deceased husband's brother—which the Westminster Confession condemns—and she asks to be shown the Scripture which forbids her. She also is told that the Confession does, and without reference to its authority, she is required to submit. Here, again, it is the principle of exalting human authority, and the refusal to consider, of which we speak, and not of the merits of the case itself. It is surely time the church were more ready to review her former acts, and revise, if not to discard, her ancient standard. But, if those who are the disciples of Christ set such an example, can the world be blamed for doing, in their own way, what is precisely similar? Or may we not rather fear that judgment will first begin at the house of God?

AMERICAN & FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

This Society, which was formed by the Baptists when they seceded from the American Bible Society, held its Annual Meeting at Albany last week, which is represeuted as having been unusually interesting. The following statistics are gathered from the Annual Report presented on that occasion:—

Total receipts, $44,845 11; total disbursements, $45,230 35. The amount received from individuals and churches is about $5,000 more than any previous year from this source.

The foreign appropriations, for the year just closed, have been: To Missionary Union, $10,500; for Scripture distribution and evangelizing purposes in Germany, by Mr. Oncken, $8,371; Southern France, by Dr. Devan, $800; Orissa, by Rev. Dr. Sutton, $1,000; Italian Scriptures, through Rev. Dr. Winslow, $245; per German Colporteur in Canada, $176; for Chinese Scripture destribution in Canton, $500; Baptist Missionaries in Calcutta, for Scriptures in Bengali and Sanscrit, $1,500; additional to Rev. J. G. Oncken, for Germany, $1,000; Total, $23,372.

The measure set on foot at the Special Meeting of the Society in Hope Chapel, 1852, for procuring permanent accommodations for the Society, rent free forever, has been the object of engrossing attention for a large portion of the year. Not less than a dozen different positions were examined, and more or less thoroughly canvassed. In the end, with signal unanimity, the premises No. 115 Nassau-st., were selected and purchased. One object aimed at has been to secure ample room for the eligible accommodation of all the coöperating denominational Societies of a general character, so that proximity and mutual convenience for them all may be promoted. A proffer of advantages of occupancy similar to our own has therefore been tendered to them, which they can accept if they choose. Nearly two-thirds of the purchase money for these valuable premises has been pledged, and most of it actually paid, chiefly in New York and vicinity. Nor can it be doubted, that the entire amount at an early day will be obtained, thus placing the Society on a basis or permanency, and securing for it advantages and conveniences which have been earnestly desired from the beginning of its career.

After the reading of the report, Hon. Judge Harris addressed the audience in a strain of fervent and eloquent congratulation, referring to the Society's origin, perils, and triumphant success, and the great work that still lies before it to be accomplished.

Addressess were also made by Rev. Drs. Potter, Taggart, Burroughs, and Smith, and J. M. Hoyt, Esq., to whom the thanks of the assembly were tendered by motion of Rev. Dr. Babcock.

On motion of Rev. S. S. Cutting, of Mass., thanks were also tendered to the Committee and donors for its new home—the Bible House—at the cost of some $55,000.

A MODERN PLEASURE EXCURSION.

Several months ago it was announced, that a New Yorker, who had made a fortune on steamships, was building a splendid steam yacht, in which he proposed to take his family and some of his frends on a voyage to the principal ports of Europe. Cornelius Vanderbilt, commonly called "Commodore," was the man referred to. His yacht, the North Star, being completed, she sailed from New York last week, with 24 passengers, all members of Mr. Vanderbilt's family, except Rev. John O. Choules and wife, and Dr. Jared Linsey. Of the route to be taken, the Tribune says:

"The Commodore expects to land first at Southampton, and, after a short stop, go round to London, where he will remain a considerable time, enjoying the sights and hospitalities of the Great Metropolis. Thence he will go up the Baltic, perhaps to see Jenny Lind, if she should be at Stockholm, and thence up the Neva, where he will be entertained at St. Petersburgh by the Emperor Nicholas, who will beyond doubt manifest great interest in the ship, if not in the Yankees. Bidding adieu to the Czar, the North Star will return to the Atlantic, try her strength with the billows of Biscay, and come to anchor off Gibralter. Thence they proceed to the classic shores of the Mediterranean, stopping at Naples, Malta, Athens, Constantinople, Alexandria, and perhaps several other ports. Sufficient stay will be made at each place to see the most worthy objects in the neighborhood, and give and receive the hospitalities incident to the occasion."

Of Mr. Vanderbilt, the Illustrated News says:—

"At an early age he showed a fondness for the sea, and took a great interest in shipping. While a very young man he became owner of a finely-rigged sailing vessel that he run regularly between Staten Island and New York. As early as 1820, he had the command of a steamboat, of which he was part owner. He became noted as one of the most enterprising and fortunate steamboat captains of the time. From captain he became owner of not only one but several steamers, and gave up the practical part of navigation to attend to his property interests. For many years he has been the largest owner of steamers—entirely his own, without partnership—probably of any man in the world. He is proprietor of over twenty steamers; one half of which are ocean steamships of the largest class, principally in the California trade."

The North Star is two hundred and sixty feet on the keel, two hundred and seventy feet on the spar-deck, thirty-eight feet breadth of beam, thirteen feet from floor timber to lower-deck beams, seven feet eight inches between decks, seven feet six inches between main and spar-decks, making her whole depth twenty-eight feet six inches. Of her fittings, a daily paper says:—

"The furniture of the main saloon is of rosewood, carved in the rich and splendid style of Louis XV., covered with a new and elegant material of figured velvet plush, with a green ground, filled with boquets of flowers. It consists of two sofas, cost $350 each; four couches, $300 each; six arm chairs, $50 each. Connected with this saloon are ten state-rooms, superbly fitted up, each with a French armour le gles, beautifully enameled in white, with a large glass door, size of plate 40x64, cost $100 each. The berths are furnished with elegant silk lambricans and lace curtains. Each room is fitted up with a different color, viz: green and gold, crimson and gold, orange, &c. The toilet furniture matches with the hangings and fittings up, by being of the same color, and presents a picture of completeness not often met with. All the table furniture is of the most gorgeous description. The China is of ruby and gold finish; and the silver ware is of the finest kind. The entire interior furnishing has been done with the single idea of producing the very best effect possible, and every article shows elaborate design and workmanship."

STATISTICS OF BENEVOLENCE.—The following statement shows the receipts of several of the leading Benevolent Societies during their last fiscal year:—

Amer. Tract Society,	$384,627
" Bible "	334,000
" B. C. F. Missions, 8mo.	136,682
" Home Mis. Society,	171,734
" For. and Christian Union,	62,000
" Seaman's Friend Society,	22,500
N. Y. State Colonization Society,	15,580

During the last eight months, the American Board has sent out thirty missionaries. The American Bible Society has increased its operations during the year by the distribution of 100,000 volumes more than last year, being for this year above 766,000 volumes. The American Home Missionary Society have had in commission, during the year, 1,083 laborers, while the previous year they had 1,062. The American and Foreign Christian Union has, during the year, employed 140 laborers, mostly in the United States. During the year ending April 1st, the American Tract Society's receipts for publications sold, amounted to $237,252 11, and for donations $247,374 64. They also granted $42,637 89 worth of publications, and sent away to foreign countries $20,000 in cash.

CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.—The Vermont Chronicle is informed that Josiah Burton, Esq, of Manchester, Vt., who died April 22d, made the following bequests in his will: For. Missions, (A. B. C. F. M.,) $500; Am. Tract Society, $500; Am. H. M. Society, $500; Vermont D. M. Society, $500; Am. Colonization Society, $500; Vermont Education Society, $500; Burr Seminary, $5,000; Female Sem. at Manchester, $6,000; Common Schools in Manchester, $5,000. Total, $19,000. There are some other bequests for like purposes, making the whole amount more than $20,000. The sum for a Female Seminary is conditional, and if the conditions are not met, the $6,000 also goes to the Burr Seminary, making $11,000 in all. Mr. Burton was the individual from whom the present pastor of the Congregational Church at Manchester received the funds for a Pastoral Library for himself and his successors.

A COLORED CHURCH AND PREACHER.—A visit to the first colored Baptist Church in New Orleans, is thus described by a correspondent of the Biblical Recorder:—

"The minister who officiated on the occasion of our visit, was a young man belonging to an estate so entailed that he cannot be bought. His sermon was a very sensible one, to me quite profitable. He reads well, and speaks more grammatically than many white ministers that occupy a respectable stand among our churches. His library, I am told, is a very respectable collection; his discourse showed that he knew its use. The clerk is a fine looking creole, who has purchased his freedom, and is a clerk for a very respectable French house in New Orleans. There are in this church about six or seven hundred members. For the sake of greater convenience, the members are divided into smaller communities, living near each other, and each community is placed under the watch-care of some faithful member, who advises with those in his care, and reports all cases requiring discipline. Few churches are better managed."

THE CANADA CLERGY RESERVES.—The recent vote in the British Parliament surrenders all jurisdiction of the Crown over the Canada Clergy Reserves, and leaves the disposition of them entirely to the Colonial Legislature. This grant was originally made in 1776. Very little income was derived from the Reserves up to the year 1819, when a claim to share in them was put forward by the Presbyterians; the clergy of the Church of England having always claimed an exclusive right therein. From that time to the present, the various denominations of Christians in the province, including the Roman Catholics, have at one time and another claimed to participate in their revenues, and the reserves have thus been a perpetual bone of contention. During the strife between the various religious denominations, propositions have been at different periods made to secularize the grants by appropriating them for educational purposes, or for public improvements.

THE UNIVERSALISTS ON TEMPERANCE.—An Annual Convention of the Universalists of Rhode Island was recently held at Providence, where high ground was taken on the subject of temperance. It was voted, that the anti-liquor law of Rhode Island is encouraging to Christian philanthropists; that instead of its being an abandonment of the Christian method of reform, it is really an outgrowth of Christianity; that in faithfully executing the law, we are obeying the will of God, the will of the people of Rhode Island, and subserving the best interests of the community. The following resolution concludes the series:—

Resolved, That as Christians, we cannot sincerely pray, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven," till we have tried every just and honorable means to eradicate so deadly an enemy of the Christian spirit and life, as intemperance has ever proved itself to be; and this Convention recommend to all who accept God as a common Father, and believe all men are brethren, to give their unwavering support to this law, which the people have chosen as their instrument for the suppression of intemperance.

THE RESCUED CHILDREN.—In a Brooklyn paper of recent date we find the following allusion to the children of whom we gave some account a few weeks ago:—

"A number of children were baptized last Sabbath in the Plymouth Church, and among them one of the little unfortunates found at the Five Points by Mr. Eells. It will be remembered, that Mr. Eells, in making his rounds as a member of the Mission Committee, found a little girl, five or six years old, in a hovel with a number of negroes. The child was inconceivably dirty and ragged, and at first he supposed it to be black; but on wetting his finger and rubbing it over the face, he discovered that it had a fair, delicate skin. He also found the child sprightly and interesting, and persuaded her to accompany him to the house of Mr. Pease, where she was washed up and decently clothed. On extending his inquiries, he found that the abandoned mother was lying at the point of death, and that she had another child, younger than this one, in some den about the Points; and after much research, he got possession of it and took it also to the Mission House and placed it under the care of Mr. Pease. He then obtained from the mother a written stipulation to give up the children to his charge, and one of them he has adopted for his own; the other has been adopted by Mr. Bradbury of New York. The mother has since died. Both the children are girls, and are remarkably sprightly, beautiful children. When Mr. Beecher, in administering the baptismal ordinance to the eldest, alluded to the circumstance of its rescue, it sent a thrill of sympathy through the audience as remarkable as we ever witnessed. There was scarcely a dry eye in the house. Old men, whose fountains of tears had not been opened since the days of their youth, showed by their reddened eyes that they had not yet forgotten to sympathize with the abandoned and lost, and that their hearts opened with a gush of feeling at their rescue."

PENALTY OF TEACHING NEGROES IN VIRGINIA.—The Norfolk Beacon tells the following story, which carries a moral with it:—

"The officers made a descent yesterday upon a negro school kept in the neighborhood of the stone bridge, by a Mrs. Douglass and her daughter, and the teachers, together with their sable pupils, were taken before his Honor. They acknowledged their guilt, but pleaded ignorance of the law, and were discharged upon a promise to do so no more. The law of the State, imposing a fine of $100 and imprisonment for six months for such offenses, is positive, and allows of no discretion in the committing magistrate."

Hereupon the Register (Philadelphia) explains:—

"We are intimately acquainted with the ladies alluded to, and our statements are based on actual knowledge of facts. Mrs. Douglass is a southerner, by birth, education, and feeling, and has always resided in the South. She has been, if she is not now, a slaveholder, and possesses all the southern prejudice against the North, and northern abolitionism in particular. So far as these matters are concerned, there is not a man or woman in the delectable city of Norfolk, who can excel her. At the same time, she is a woman whose heart is as open as the day to every benevolent work, and whose charitable nature is worthy of the profoundest reverence."

OBERLIN MANUAL LABOR COLLEGE.—The Editor of the Cleveland True Democrat writes thus in relation to this institution:—

We made a visit to Oberlin on Monday, where we spent the day. This is a beautiful and thriving Yankee village. It is known all over the country on account of its college. It is 34 miles from Cleveland, on the railroad leading from Cleveland to Toledo. In 1833, this spot was all woods; now there is a town of 2,000 inhabitants, besides the students, who number 835; 378 of whom are females. An impression has obtained, somehow, that the proportion of colored pupils is very great. They do not in all number 50, and many of them are nearly white. Charles G. Finney is President of the Institution; eight Professors, and a great number of teachers as assistants. They are all workers, practical men, who can turn their hands to anything that is necessary to be done. Prof. Bascom, we saw at work on his farm, with his pantaloons inside of his boots, and otherwise dressed farmer-like, driving his wagon. The "Edmundson Girls," whose history is so tragic, are receiving an education there. They were sent by Mrs. Stowe, who pays for their education. Mary, the older of the two, is very sick, and fears are entertained that she will not recover. Emily's health is good, and she possesses the talent and energy that will make her a bright scholar.

PRIZE ESSAY ON TOBACCO.—The Water-Cure Journal is authorized by a friend of reform to offer One Hundred Dollars, in prizes of $50 for the first, $30 for the second, and $20 for the third best essay on the deleterious effects of Tobacco on the human constitution, intellectually, morally, and physically, with suggestions for the cure of the evil, or how persons can break the habit; to be comprised in 16 tract pages, the manuscripts to be submitted to Messrs. Fowlers & Wells, and such other persons as they may select to aid them in the examination. Each essay to be without any name, and the author's name and address sent in a sealed envelop with the essay, to be opened only after the awards shall be made. The essays must be received previous to the the first day of November, 1853, and the awards to be published in the January No. of The Phrenological and Water-Cure Journals for 1854; and the accepted essays to be the property of the donor of the prizes, to be published for the benefit of mankind—the profits arising from the sale to be offered in like premiums for other essays on the same subject.

LARGE CHARITABLE BEQUEST.—The late Robert G. Shaw, of Boston, bequeathed in his will the sum of $110,000, to be set apart at interest by his Executors until it shall amount to $400,000; the sum then to be known as the "Shaw Fund," and to be appropriated for the benefit of destitute mariners' children, under the age of ten years.

The total number of Rum Licenses granted in New York this spring, up to March 24, is 1,474.

ORDINATION OF AN INDIAN.—In connection with the anniversary of the American Home Missionary Society, recently held at Troy, James Tanner, a half-breed Chippewa Indian, was ordained to the work of the ministry, which he proposes to exercise among his countrymen. Rev. Drs. Hill and Peck took part in the exercises, which are represented as deeply interesting. Tanner is described as a man of remarkable mental force and natural talent. He held the vast audience in breathless attention for more than an hour, describing his conversion, his creed, and giving his reasons for becoming a Baptist. He then dwelt upon the character, habits and morals of the Chippewas, concluding an able and powerful address, by an earnest, manly and affectionate appeal to all present to aid him, and the Society whose Missionary he was about to become, to preach the Gospel among his beloved countrymen.

At the close of the ordination, it was proposed by a Rhode Island clergyman to raise, at once, five hundred dollars expressly for the benefit of the Missionary, and such was the readiness and willingness to comply—the proposer having started with a donation of fifty dollars, which he afterward doubled—that in thirty minutes one thousand dollars were subscribed, half of which is to be devoted to the Missionary's especial benefit, and the other half to be devoted to the augmentation of the funds of the Home Mission Society.

LAST MOMENTS OF VICE-PRESIDENT KING.—The Southern Republic has received from Mr. F. K. Beck—a kinsman of the Vice-President—a brief account of the last moments of Mr. King. It says: "He was quiet and resigned to the fate which he had seen for some time awaited him. Shortly before six o'clock, on Monday evening, while a few friends were sitting around his bed-side, the only ones that he would allow in the sick room, he suddenly remarked that he was dying. The watchers arose to their feet, under some excitement, when the Colonel said: 'Be still—make no noise—let me die quietly.' He refused to have the balance of his household notified of his dying condition. His physician came in and examined him. The Colonel said to him: 'Doctor, I am dying. It seems as though I shall never get through with it. I am dying very hard. Take the pillows from under my head. The pillows were accordingly taken from under his head; but affording no relief, the Doctor turned him from his back on his side, when he died in a moment."

PRESBYTERIAN GENERAL ASSEMBLY.—The New School Presbyterian General Assembly was in session at Buffalo last week. Among the subjects considered was a motion by Dr. Gilbert, that the first Monday in January be observed as a day of fasting and prayer for the conversion of the world. As this day falls on New Year, considerable discussion arose as to the practicability of holding prayer-meetings in large cities where a different mode of spending the day prevails. It was resolved, finally, not to give place to fashion, but to adhere to the good custom. The last Thursday in February was also set apart as a day of prayer for Colleges.

CONVENTION OF COLORED PEOPLE.—Frederick Douglass' paper, of Rochester, contains a call, numerously signed by the colored men of different States, for a National Convention, to be held at Rochester, July 6th, 1853. The expressed object of the Convention is to devise means for the advancement of the colored race in the United States; to thwart the efforts of the American Colonization Society; to consider what is to be done with the funds expected to be contributed by the English people through Mrs. Stowe; and to establish a permanent organization for the general objects which they have in view. The Convention is to be composed of delegates exclusively.

LIBERTY OR DEATH.—At East Baton Rouge, La., lately, an escaped negro slave, whom two citizens of Port Hudson attempted to recapture, so resolutely fought for his freedom, that they were obliged to desist. They thereupon obtained a pack of dogs and pursued the fugitive to a drift in the river, where the dogs brought him to bay. When the pursuing party came up, he refused to surrender, and was immediately shot and fell into the water. So determined was the poor fellow not to be captured, that when an effort was made to rescue him from drowning, he made battle with his club, and sunk waving his weapon in angry defiance at his pursuers.

TESTIMONIAL TO FATHER GAVAZZI.—The eloquent and fearless manner in which Father Gavazzi has exhibited the tendencies of Popery and the claims of Protestantism, by his recent lectures in New York, has won for him high respect and numerous friends. A meeting was held at Metropolitan Hall, on the evening of the 13th inst., to present him a testimonial, in the form of a purse of one thousand dollars, and two Bibles, one in French and one in Italian. The occasion was made interesting by addresses from several distinguished speakers and from Gavazzi himself.

CARSON ON THE ATONEMENT.—We are indebted to the publisher, Edward H. Fletcher, 141 Nassau-st., N. Y., for a 12mo. volume of 442 pages, entitled, "The Doctrine of the Atonement," by ALEXANDER CARSON. It is a clear and forcible statement and illustration of a fundamental doctrine, by one who seems to have been perfectly familiar with his subject. The volume also contains a "Letter to the Emperor Napoleon," after his banishment to Elba, on "the most important of all subjects," and a defense of "Evangelical Preaching," in reply to the attacks of the Edinburgh Review.

RETURN OF A MISSIONARY.—Rev. E. W. Syle and family, of Shanghae, China, arrived in New York last week, by the ship Mandarin.

By the Mandarin we received letters from brethren Carpenter and Wardner. They and their families were in good health, and cheerfully prosecuting the work in which they are engaged.

General Intelligence.

European News.

London papers to May 6, were received in New York on the 19th, by steamer Africa.

In the British House of Commons, an interesting debate on corruption in Parliamentary elections brought out a sharp and amusing speech from Mr. Drummond.

A great excitement had been caused by a Mr. Duffy, who alledged that attempts had been made to bribe the Irish Members of Parliament, but he afterward retracted the charge.

A Peace Deputation had waited on Lord Clarendon to ask him to have a clause inserted in treaties with the United States agreeing to settle all future disputes by arbitration; his Lordship politely declined the request.

The "May Meetings" were in progress at Exeter Hall. Professor Stowe's name figures in the list of reverend gentlemen in attendance.

The Duchess of Sutherland had invited a large number of ladies and gentlemen to meet Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe at Stafford-house on Saturday, May 7. After a short stay in London, it is said that she will go to France and Germany; and having visited Scotland once more, she has promised to be the guest of Major General Sir Duncan McGregor, in Dublin, previous to her return to her own country.

From Ireland, the chief intelligence relates to the emigration movement, which is more active this season than ever, and is mostly to America, the means being supplied by remittances from previous emigrants in the United States.

A funeral service in honor of Napoleon the Great, was celebrated on Wednesday, May 4, in the chapel of the Tuilleries; the Emperor and Ministers of State were present. In the chapel of the Invalids a similar service was performed.

Four negroes, who had been in service in Vienna, repaired lately to Bremen, intending to return to the United States by the American steamer Hermann. They paid for their passage and their berths to the agent, but were refused a passage by the captain on the ground of the American laws forbidding any negro to be conveyed by steamer from Europe to the United States. No representations were of any avail, and the four blacks were compelled to take their way to England, and get what redress they could from the agents.

By this arrival we hear of the death of the Marquis de Valdegamas, Spanish Ambassador in Paris, better known as Juan Donoso Cortes, one of the most distinguished men of his country, both as a secular and an ecclesiastical politician. He was one of the most active leaders of the Ultramontane party in the Catholic Church, as well as a zealous and efficient supporter of the Spanish crown. He first rose to distinction in 1832, during the illness of Ferdinand VII, when he devoted himself to the interests of Christina, the queen regent, and of her daughter the present queen. His zeal in their cause was followed by ample political rewards, which he continued to enjoy in increasing profusion till the time of his death.

From Turkey, we hear that the question of the Holy Places is settled in favor of Russia.

California News.

By the way of New Orleans, we have two weeks later news from California, being to April 30th.

The steamship Georgia sailed from Chagres on the evening of the 15th for New York, with two hundred passengers and $2,300,000 in gold dust.

The steamship Golden Gate, on her passage down to Panama, one night, came in collision with another steamer, supposed to be the Sierra Nevada. The Golden Gate sustained only slight injury, and as the other kept on her way, it is supposed she was not materially damaged.

The Grand Jury of the District Court of San Francisco, had ignored the bill brought against Captain Sampson, of the steamer Independence, for manslaughter, but said if they had the power they would bring true bills against the owners and agents of the Vanderbilt line, on account of the miserable outfit, unseaworthiness, and other acts, and the unjustifiable negligence which entailed the loss of over one hundred lives.

The accounts from the mines appear to be of a favorable character.

In the Senate, on the 29th of April, the bill for the extension of the city front of San Francisco was indefinitely postponed by the casting vote of the Lieut. Governor.

Two fires had occurred at San Francisco, but they were fortunately extinguished before any damage of importance was done.

The banking house of Page, Bacon & Co., had been robbed of $3,000.

New discoveries of gold near Negro Hill are reported.

The Agricultural prospects of the State are flattering.

Anti-Rent Outrage.—A dispatch from Schoharie, N. Y., dated May 19th, says: A Mr. Lawrence proceeded to the house of Jacob J. Deitz, on Tuesday last, for the purpose of serving a summons. He found Mr. D. near his house, and handed him the papers. Deitz took them and read them, when he threw them on the ground, seized Lawrence by the throat, and called him a scoundrel, for coming to serve papers on him. He then called to his family to blow a horn, when a man named Hollenbeck, who was at work for Deitz as a mason, interceded for Lawrence, who managed to get away, and started off on a run. Deitz followed in pursuit, knocked Lawrence down, and held him until four men in disguise made their appearance. They then tied his hands behind him, and took him to a small piece of brush, near by; then tore off his coat, vest and cravat, and, with a jack knife, cut off his hair, occasionally cutting the scalp, and remarking that they had a plaster that would heal it up; they tarred his head and body, and poured tar into his boots. After exhausting all their ingenuity this way, each cut a stick, and whipped him until they got tired. They then tied his hands before him, and started him for the house, each of them kicking him at every step. They made him take the papers back, but took them away again, when, after knocking him down again, they left him, and he succeeded in reaching the residence of Geo. Becker, last evening. His legs, hands, arms, and face, are badly bruised.

Chinese Drama.—A company of Chinamen, who have come to this country by way of California, are now giving dramatic entertainments at Niblo's Garden, N. Y., in which the religious and other ceremonies of the Celestrials are represented. According to the play-bill, it forms a living history of China, as follows: Part I—To commence with the imposing religious ceremony, Invocation to Toss; Mu-chong-wong, King of Kings; Konumn, Queen of Heaven; Ten How, Lady of Light, supplicating benediction and blessing for future welfare in the United States. Grand feast and presentation to the gods and goddesses of the Beasts, Birds and Fishes, from the Throne of the Imperial Dragon. Part II—Grand Marriage Ceremony, entrance of the Emperor and train, unveiling of the bride. Part III—Japanese Tumblers, &c.

One of the daily papers says of the performance:—

The dresses are gorgeous to the last degree. All that silk, crape, gold-tissue—the cumulated splendors of Chinese taste—could conceive, flaunted on the stage. A gilded range of lofty steps, covering all the stage, surmounted by a Chinese nondescript, and rows of chairs, was the chief scene of operations. The different characters came with glorious pomposity, and ching-changed, or chum-fee-hoed it in front of the platform, and then ascended the platform. Sometimes one spoke alone, sometimes several the same words. Chinese music was rendered by sticks beaten together, cymbals, a bowed instrument played as a viol or violin, sounding like a bagpipe, and using the Scotch scale identically, or the black notes of the piano-forte, bating various discordances. The singing and playing were like a compound of distressed cats, an old pump handle, ungreased cart wheels, a poker on a tin pan, and the spiritual rappers in communion with the infernal regions.

A Mammoth Steamer.—By the last arrival from Europe, it is announced, that a contract has been made in England for the construction of a mammoth steamer, upward of six hundred feet in length, and measuring 12,000 tuns. The Tribune says that the idea of a monster ship like this is not original with John Bull. Mr. Burden, of Troy, in this State, a man of wealth, and a mechanic of original genius, some years ago suggested the construction of a steamer 700 feet in length, and of corresponding depth and width, to run to Europe. Mr. Burden's idea was, that it is practicable to construct a steamer which would go across the Atlantic with as little motion as our Brooklyn ferry steamers run to our sister city. He proposed that his steamer should draw seventy-five feet of water, and her top to be an hundred feet above the water line. The maximum hight of the waves of the ocean, from the bottom of the sea-trough to the crest of the wave, is estimated not to exceed thirty-five feet; hence Mr. Burden concluded that a vessel of seventy-five feet draught would always run on a nearly even keel. There are but few ports where such a vessel could enter. On our coast, Newport offers the greatest facilities of a good harbor, with ease of access and abundance of water, and here Mr. Burden proposed to establish the head-quarters of his ship. No steps were ever taken to carry out the majestic idea of our countryman, and it is now broached on the other side of the Atlantic, and measures are taken to secure its realization. The proposed British ship is to be propelled by two sets of side-wheels and a screw at the stern, having, we presume, three independent engines and sets of machinery.

Remarkable Escape.—On Saturday evening, May 14th, while the Broadway Tabernacle was filled with an enthusiastic audience, the pavement leading to the doorway of the building gave way, and fell with a tremendous crash into the cellar below. The regular speakers had concluded, and Mr. Douglas was called on for a speech; he had not been speaking above two or three minutes when the crash was heard; many persons started up in affright to learn the cause, and the audience were only pacified by repeated assurances that "nothing serious was the matter." On going to the door, we were shocked at the narrow escape which a great many persons undoubtedly met with; for had not Mr. Douglas been called on to speak, the whole of the people in the building would have been crowding out upon this hollow pavement, and the probability is that many would have been precipitated into the cellar below, some 10 feet deep, and the descent of the large flag-stones of the pavement upon them undoubtedly would have killed and injured a great number of persons. The buildings next to the Tabernacle had been pulled down, and workmen had been excavating the foundations, thereby shaking the pavement from its place, and rendering the ground over which some thousands would pass, but little better than a vast man-trap, wanting but some unlucky movement, or the weight of a number of persons, to spring it, and carry misery and death to many a home.

Death of a Noble Boy.—The Deposit (N. Y.) Courier has an account of the death of Nelson Freeman, (son of Wm. J. Freeman of Deposit, but now absent in California,) an interesting lad some 15 years of age, who lost his life under circumstances sad indeed. A younger brother, three years old, had strayed away from home to the river, where he got upon a slab and floated out into the stream. Nelson, missing him, started in pursuit, and discovered his little brother near a mill-dam, over which he was carried, and then, after giving the alarm, plunged in and swam to him, but from some cause was unable to extricate himself or his brother. The latter, however, was carried out of the whirl and floated by the swift water some fifteen rods where he was taken out almost lifeless, but was restored with considerable effort. Nelson was less fortunate. He sank, and was under water some ten minutes, when he rose and was taken out, but all efforts to save the young hero were unavailing; life was extinct.

A Wisconsin paper puffs the healthiness of the place where it is printed after this wise: "Owing to the healthfulness of our city, the two hearses formerly owned here have been sent to localities where they are likely to find more employment. To supply the occasional demand for such a vehicle, Mr. Norris, at a great prospective sacrifice, is now getting up one, and expects to have it completed in the course of one or two weeks."

SUMMARY.

Eighty-three Italians, who, according to the statement of the Piedmontese Government, took arms at the announcement of the late outbreak in Milan, and held themselves in readiness on the frontiers of Lombardy, to render assistance to the rising Lombards, were ordered by the military authorities to retire to their homes, which order was at once obeyed. But the following day they received another command to present themselves before the political authorities in Alessandria, by whom they were immediately arrested, and from thence under the strictest arrest transported to Villapama on the 29th March, put on board a Sardinian man-of-war, where they were treated like prisoners, and arrived finally in America.

A dispatch dated Buffalo, Friday, May 20, 1853, says:—A severe gale occurred on Lake Erie yesterday, and numerous disasters are reported. The schooner Andes beached at Cleveland, the crew were saved, but the cargo of corn was badly damaged. The vessel will be saved. The propeller Ohio put into Tonawanda with five feet of water in her hold, having sprung a leak. The schr. Ellington, loaded with railroad iron, sank near Sandusky. Other boats also report seeing vessels capsized on the lake, and their crews supposed to be lost. A fishing vessel was capsized a mile from Cleveland harbor. William Kelly, the owner, and two others, were drowned.

Jesse Hutchinson, of the Hutchinson Family, died recently at a water-cure establishment near Cincinnati. He was the eldest of the large family of that name, which originated at Milford, N. H., and has made it a household word wherever simple and sweet English song is loved. He was about forty years of age, and at the time of his death was on his way home from California, where he had not been very fortunate. He was a man of almost infantile simplicity of character, of warm affections, and of sterling integrity. Every movement for the interests of humanity received his warmest sympathy and devoted efforts.

A convention was held at Norwich, N. Y., on Wednesday of last week, in favor of the construction of a railroad through the valley of the Chenango to connect with the New York and Erie Road at Binghampton. After a long discussion on the advantages severally presented by Rome and Utica as the Northern terminus, the convention decided in favor of the latter, and the Company was organized under the name of the Utica and Binghampton Railroad. The estimated distance from Binghampton to Utica is ninety miles, and the road will cost about $1,660,000. At Utica the road will connect with the contemplated road through the Black River country to the River St. Lawrence.

The Boston Traveler, of May 21, says: An old gentleman from Western New York was robbed in the Albany cars yesterday, while on his way to Boston, of his wallet containing $300, all he had with him. Yesterday afternoon, a gentleman laid his valice and cloak down in the gentlemen's room of the Boston and Worcester Railroad depot, was absent a few minutes, and on his return they were both gone. Other persons in the room state that a man came in, coolly threw the cloak over his shoulder, took up the valice, and marched off. A robbery of a precisely similar character occurred at the Old Colony Railroad depot yesterday afternoon.

Washington, Macomb Co., Mich., was visited on the 17th inst. by one of the severest storms of rain and hail ever witnessed. The course of the storm was from N. W. to S. E., and extended over a track of country three or four miles in width. At Lakeville, 12 miles N. W., it did more damage. It unroofed houses and barns, and the hail took out all the glass. At Washington it destroyed most of the windows on the west side, and made a fine rattle, for the hail stones were from the size of a pea to that of a goose egg. One measured eight inches in circumference.

A Committee on behalf of the citizens of Utica, have reported that they had inspected the proposed line of the Black River and Utica Railroad, to its Northern terminus at Clayton. At that place they found one of the best bays and harbors for a terminus that could be desired. Mr. Jenne, the Chief Engineer of the Company, says there is no difficulty in the way of getting a good line, and that the entire cost of the road will not exceed $20,000 a mile. It is expected that the entire line will be ready to put under contract in a short time.

We find in an exchange a recipe of great value to our subscribers in "the woods." It is for a new method of making candles. To twelve pounds of lard use of alum and saltpetre each one pound; dissolve the alum and saltpetre in a small quantity of water, then pour into the melted lard, and boil the whole until the water evaporates. The mixture requires constant stirring to prevent settling in the bottom of the vessel. Candles made of this composition are equal to the best tallow, and last longer.

The New Haven Palladium says: A man has been arrested in Ohio, having in his possession some five hundred counterfeit $10 bills upon the City Bank of this city. Several of the notes have been sent to the bank here, and their appearance is eminently calculated to deceive even the most skillful judge of spurious money. It is probable they were got up for the Western market, and it is therefore doubtful whether any of them are in circulation in this section. It is possible also, that the batch taken was the first issue.

On many of the Railways of Great Britain, but more especially those in the North of England, the Engineer's duty is to attend to the engine alone; the lookout is a separate duty altogether. There are on each train two guards—their stations are at the back part of two separate cars, in glass houses, in which their heads are raised about two feet from the level of the roof, giving the guards a fair view of each object that may come within the range of their vision.

In Western Illinois the weather has been delightful, and the prospect for winter wheat has not been so good for the last five or six years. It has come up thick and good; with the early spring there is no danger at all of rust. The same reports come to us from all the West.

Somebody has just published "A Guide Around New York and Vicinity; What to See and What to be Seen; with Hints and Advice to Those who Visit the Great Metropolis." It contains little truth, and a vast deal of mere guess work, and bad guessing at that.

The sale of lands belonging to the State Bank of Illinois, took place on the 11th inst. at Belleville, Illinois. The attendance was large, and the sale went off briskly, at prices varying from five to ten dollars per acre, payment being made in the notes of the Bank, which were selling at seventy cents on the dollar. It is doubtful whether the assets of the Bank will be sufficient to meet the circulation yet outstanding.

The Twenty-sixth Annual Fair of the American Institute will be held in the City of New York, during the month of October next, commencing with the receipt of goods and specimens on the first day. Extraordinary efforts will be put in requisition to render this great National Exhibition unsurpassed in all its departments.

About sixty miles of the Illinois Central Railroad are completed, and trains are running or will be in a few days between Bloomington and Lasalle, where the road connects with the Chicago and Rock Island Road. From Bloomington a good line of stages runs over a fine road to Springfield.

The Michigan Southern and Northern Indiana Railroad runs three daily trains between Toledo and Monroe and Chicago. The Lightning Express makes the time in 8½ hours—thus taking passengers from Chicago to Buffalo, all the way by railroad, in about 18 to 20 hours—and by railroad and Lake, in 23 to 24 hours, and performing the distance from Chicago to New York in 32 to 36 hours.

The Norfolk (Va.) Argus states that a curious phenomenon attended the hail storm in that city on Tuesday night. Quantities of catfish, some measuring a foot in length, fell in different sections of the city, and some of the fields were literally strewed with them. Hundreds were picked up in the morning. This (says The Argus) is no piscatorial fabrication, but a fact which is attested by hundreds of citizens.

Rhode Island has at present no less than seventy-one banking institutions, with an aggregate capital of $14,000,000. Of these, twenty-six are located in Providence, with a capital of $10,419,000, or an average of about $400,000 each. Seven new banks have been incorporated at the late session of the Legislature.

The Fond du Lac (Wis.) Journal says that the wheat crop in that region promises an abundant yield. The Appleton Crescent, Outagamie County, Wis., says the wheat in that vicinity looks unusually promising. In Monmouth Co., N. J., the wheat and rye crops look fine, and they have plenty of strawberries. Corn not yet planted.

Died, on the 17th May, at Brooklin, New Jersey, David Brombush, aged 92 years. He was born in 1762, at Bergen, L. I. At 18 years of age he was employed by Gen. Washington to cart specie to pay off the troops, and to perform such other duties as were required of him.

DIED,

In Friendship, N. Y., April 15th, 1853, of a disease of the liver and lungs, Dea. Ezekiel Johnson, aged sixty-one years. Dea. Johnson was an old and esteemed member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Friendship, being among the oldest of its members, and was always punctual at all the meetings of the church, and manifested a deep interest for the cause of Christ. For a year past he had been declining in health, so as to deprive him of the means of grace and Sabbath privileges, and the church of his labors; yet we have confidence that he "sleeps in Jesus" and "rests from his labors." His funeral was attended by a large congregation, as he was extensively known and appreciated, at the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house in Nile.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Titsworths & Dunn, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

The Illustrated Weekly Record

OF THE NEW YORK EXHIBITION OF THE INDUSTRY OF ALL NATIONS, under the direction of Prof. B. Silliman, Jr., aided by eminent writers in each Department of Science and Art.

This Journal, as its name implies, will record the history, progress, and results of the New York Industrial Exhibition.

The Literary portion of the paper will be prepared under competent editorial supervision, by the ablest literary, scientific, and practical men, and will include essays, descriptions, and criticisms, in the following Departments:—
I. Natural Science—Raw Materials, &c.
II. Machinery.
III. Manufactures—in Subdivisions.
IV. Fine Arts.

General Essays may be expected on the condition and results of the several Departments, on the natural resources of our country, and on the methods by which they may be made most available to American Art, and to artistic and industrial Manufactures. Other articles of a more general scope, on topics naturally suggested by the Exhibition, will be occasionally admitted. It is intended that all the descriptions and criticisms shall be accurate, and strictly impartial and independent. The Essays will be as free as possible from mere technicalities, and every effort will be made to render them attractive and interesting to general readers.

The Letter-Press will be illustrated by Engravings of the most beautiful, interesting, and suggestive of the various objects exhibited, including, as far as possible, all such as may gratify and instruct. THE RECORD will thus supply sources of instruction to Artisans and Manufacturers of every class, and render the Exhibition permanently and practically useful, long after the contents have been dispersed.

THE ILLUSTRATED RECORD will be issued weekly from the opening to the close of the Exhibition, and will be completed in twenty-six numbers, besides a probable Supplement.

Each number will consist of four double-columned pages of letter-press, four pages of Illustrations, and four pages devoted to the circulars of Exhibitors. The first number will contain four extra pages, including Architectural details of the Building, and the designs by Sir Jos. Paxton and the late A. J. Downing, and will be published on the day of the opening of the Exhibition.

"Office of the Association for the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations,
New York, 21st Jan., 1853.

"Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Co.—Gentlemen: The proposals made by you, in conformity with the advertisement, issued from this office on the 22d November, having been accepted, and a contract made thereupon, you have become exclusively entitled to the privilege of publishing, under the authority and sanction of this Association, an Illustrated Catalogue and Illustrated Newspaper relating to the Exhibition, now in course of preparation, and of printing and selling the same in the Exhibition Building. You have also become contractors for the publication of the Hand Catalogue. For the compilation, publication, and sale of these works, you will receive all the facilities that the Board of Directors can reasonably afford you.

"You are well aware that the object of the Association, in making an arrangement of this kind, is not pecuniary gain, but to secure a publication of a superior grade of typographical, literary, and artistic merit. To this you have assented; and if the very high standard agreed on be reached by you, the result will, it is hoped, be of great and lasting beneficial influence.

"I am, very respectfully, gentlemen,
"Your obedient servant,
"W. WHETTEN, Secretary."

Terms—For the 26 Nos. and Supplement, post-paid, $3, in advance.

A handsome Cover for the Volume will be furnished to subscribers. Price 50 cents.

Miscellaneous.

Flax—its Production and Manufacture.

The following article is from the pen of a distinguished agriculturist in New England. It was first published in the Connecticut Valley Farmer and Mechanic.

While unnumbered products of the earth and the ocean are food for man, nature has given us but three substances which human skill has made available for cheap and serviceable clothing. The necessities of polar life and the dictates of fashion and taste make use of silk and furs, but the millions of our race will ever be clad in fabrics of wool, cotton and flax.

Of these products, the last is grown on the wildest range of soil and climate. The sheep, when reared in hot climates, is no longer a wool-bearing animal, and cotton, of any peculiar excellence, is limited to districts in warm latitudes, which afford the requisite conditions of soil and climate. But the flax plant, more cosmopolitan in its nature, flourishes from the equator to the outmost limits of field culture, and in any soil favorable to the common native growth of each region.

The cultivation and manufacture of flax were known in ancient times, and especially attained great perfection in Egypt. In the absence of labor-saving machinery, it ts produced with less labor than cotton, and for ages, as the cheapest material for cloth, it maintained the precedence. For domestic use, it was once extensively grown in this country, as is evinced by those monuments of the industry of our grandmothers—the treasured heir-looms of household linen.

But the introduction of power machinery, which banished the hand-wheel and loom, and especially the invention of the cotton-gin, put flax under an eclipse. For a time nothing but the intrinsic excellence of its fiber saved it from complete abandonment in the competition with its cheaper rival, cotton. More recently, improved machinery for its preparation and manufacture has revived its use, but still, sustained by the wonderful inventions of Arkwright and Whitney, cotton leads unrivaled, as the cheap material for textile fabrics. In this respect, the relative change has been solely effected by the more successful application of mechanical science to the one than to the other. And in view of the magnitude and astounding influence of the cotton interest, which can only be sustained by the same relative advantages which so suddenly secured its ascendency, the comparative extent to which new labor-saving agencies may be applied to the two substances, is well worth our attention.

Upon soils of similar fertility, the average product of flax fiber is somewhat greater than that of cotton, but in the process of cleaning the former, the excess is more than lost in the tow resulting from the operation. In the comparative field culture required by the two plants there is a wide difference. While cotton must be planted, and during its growth demands the repeated use of the plow and hoe, flax is raised as cheaply as oats. The labor of picking the seed cotton on an acre, is greater than the aggregate required to pull a like breadth of flax, bind it, remove the seed, handle it in rotting, and complete all the processes until it is ready for dressing the fiber. A careful estimate of the comparative labor expended upon the two crops, by the usual treatment, shows that up to the point of cleaning the staples for market, the cost of flax averages but little more than one half that of cotton. But if the comparison be followed through the succeeding step, this relation is reversed. With the cotton-gin, one hand and two horses can clean one thousand pounds of cotton in a day; while, to dress a like quantity of flax in the same time, four horses and thirteen men are required, with the use of the best common machinery.

At this point only, in the processes of production, cotton secures the ascendency, but it is here complete and triumphant. While a single cotton-gin performs the labor of a hundred hands, the rotary breaker and scutching-wheel, in comparison with the old hand break and swingling knife, save but two-thirds of the manual labor required in dressing flax; and, if the greater waste in tow and the cost of motive power be taken into the account, the absolute saving is no more than one half.

We thus have the economical aspects of flax and cotton, as they are now produced. The comparative excellence of the two materials is sufficiently determined by the universal preference for linen fabrics, when not overruled by regard for expense. But so long as cheapness is a paramount consideration, the future of flax, and especially the hope for its general and speedy adoption as an agricultural staple by our farmers, depends upon the possibility of reducing the present cost of its production. Of this we have the most confident expectation. And our hopes are based primarily upon improvements lately perfected and now ready for general introduction.

To recur to our comparison—since the question is one of economical rivalry—we think the labor of producing cotton cannot further be materially lessened. The possible contrivance of a drill planter, adapted to meet a difficulty existing in the downy coating of the cotton seed, and the production of a cotton-gin which shall act less injuriously upon the fiber than that in common use, with perhaps better modes of putting up the staple for transportation to market, are the only practicable improvements. When all this is done, the cost of production will not be essentially diminished so long as the field culture is indispensable, and, from the nature of the plant, cotton picking is hopelessly a manual operation.

In respect to flax, we believe that labor-saving agencies, now at command and in course of development, are sure to ameliorate its production to an extraordinary degree. The labor of pulling the flax crop is always regarded by the farmer as severe and tedious, and coming, as it does, at the busiest season of the year, is really one of the greatest hindrances to the cultivation of the plant for its fiber. When the flax stands with a rival growth of weeds, hand-pulling is indispensable to separate one from the other. But, when the crop is without these signs of bad husbandry, it can be cut with a mowing machine of the lately improved construction. With this machine, on a smooth surface, a boy and two horses can cut an acre of flax in an hour. The loss of an inch or two of the stalk left on the root is of no comparative account, as the fiber is there light and coarse. The flax as it is cut falls prostate behind the cutter of the machine, and is immediately taken up by the workmen who follow, and laid one side in handfuls to receive the sun, or made into small bundles at once; care being taken to keep the stalks parallel and their butt ends even. The labor of taking up the cut flax is somewhat greater than when it is spread after pulling in the usual way, but the comparative saving in time and expense is twenty fold, and for all subsequent handling, the flax is better without the root.

On the different modes of removing the seed and rotting the flax straw, we do not propose to enlarge. We are willing to suppose them not susceptible of material improvement. Either may be employed to best advantage according to circumstances. Dew rotting requires the least labor and outlay, and though the quality and quantity of fiber are inferior to that produced by either water rotting or steeping, the farmer will find a partial compensation in the increased productiveness of the grass fields upon which the flax is spread.

In the subsequent operation of dressing or separating the fibers from the woody portion of the plant, which has been the chief item of expense in the preparation of flax, we find ground for the largest expectations. Hitherto, not only has the best machinery used for this purpose proved of small comparative benefit in the diminution of manual labor, but the mechanical action employed strains and tears the fiber, which results in the production of a large proportion of tow so mingled with the woody fragments as to be of little value. Besides this waste in dressing the fiber, which ordinarily equals one-third of the whole, the flax is sent to market filled with short, broken fibers, and on being heckled at the manufactory, about one-half goes to tow. The production of the valuable long fiber, or, as it is technically called, line flax, is thus reduced to one-third of the whole. And the loss to the producer is exemplified in the fact that the line flax is at least five times the average value of the tow.

By a new machine, for which in March of this year a patent was granted to S. A. Clemens, of Springfield, Mass., two men are able to dress four hundred pounds of flax in a day. And, what is of scarcely less importance than this great saving of labor, such is the nature of the mechanical action used that the aggregate saving of tow in dressing and heckling is estimated at one-half. These results are equivalent to an entire saving of the expense of dressing flax by the old methods. In this respect, this improvement is more remarkable than the cotton-gin, which more or less injures the quality of the cotton fiber. Though the new machine was designed for working rotted flax, such is the efficiency of its action that unrotted flax straw can be broken and cleaned with nearly the rapidity and perfection of the other. What effect the extraordinary result of dressing raw flax by power will have in the development of the flax interest, cannot yet be determined. If the necessity of rotting in the straw can be removed, another important reduction in the cost of flax will be secured. Doubtless the resinous substance which adheres to the raw flax fiber may be dissolved by steeping in water, as well after it is dressed as when in the straw. But there is especial encouragement that, by improved chemical processes, perfected under scientific direction, the raw material can be converted into pure flax fiber of both long and short staple. We have before us long flax of great strength and beauty, prepared from machine-dressed, unrotted fiber, by processes discovered by David A. Wells, Esq., the able editor of The Annual of Scientific Discovery. The success which has attended the experiments of this gentleman, is now commanding the attention of leading manufacturing capitalists in New England. And our confidence in the value of the discovery is based upon the ability to treat flax for the removal of impurities without impairing its length, in distinction from the celebrated Claussen process, by which this chief excellence of the fiber is discarded.

In estimating the future of flax as a cheap material for cloth, the adaption of machinery to its manufacture must not be forgotten. The invention of the cotton-gin was not the sole agent in the development of the cotton interest. The cotemporary discoveries and invention of Arkwright, Crampton, and others, contributed not less to the vast result. Until within a few years, while England, aided by powerful machinery, was clothing the world in cotton, flax was spun and woven by hand. Now, by foreign improvement, linen yarns of similar numbers are spun by a power at a cost only of 30 per cent. greater than cotton. Yet, up to this hour, not a single set of linen machinery has been made in America. We look with confident interest to the time when the inventive genius of our countrymen shall be directed to this new field. With the contribution of one-half of the improvements to linen which they have made on the cotton machinery, the two interests will be on equal ground in respect to economy of manufacture. The greater density of flax requires about 30 per cent. more material in yarns of given fineness, but the superior beauty and durability of linen cloth makes it of at least double value.

In summing up the improvements already demonstrated to be applicable to flax, we are led to the belief that it can be produced as cheaply as cotton. This appears especially evident when the value of the seed is regarded, which alone amply repays the expense of cultivation. The consideration of cheapness of production, by commanding the attention of the manufacturers of our country and the mechanical skill which they influence, will secure still greater economy in working it by power machinery. As a material for cheap cloths, flax and cotton will then be on the same footing. In this result, both the North and the South are alike interested. The plant is cultivated with equal success in both sections, and the diversion to flax of a part of the productive industry now so exclusively employed in growing cotton, will be a benefit. To the whole country it opens, with new aspects, an important field of enterprise. Farmers, mechanics and manufacturers are equally concerned in its development.

In Great Britain the flax interest is of great and increasing importance. Although the home production is large, yet flax is there yearly imported to the value of $25,000,000. In the great demand for fabrics made of this material, there is no danger of an early over production.

In America, flax is not raised for its fibre to any considerable extent, save in a few counties in New York and New Jersey. Further West it is largely cultivated for the seed alone. With the introduction of improved machinery, we are confident that this plant will be widely grown for both of its valuable products. That flax is not comparatively an exhausting crop, is now settled by the judgment of the best agriculturists. Indeed, with the exception of two per cent. of organic matter, the fibre of the plant is wholly derived from the atmosphere. In the outset of the business, the ordinary qualities may be chiefly produced, and will be proved sufficiently profitable. Afterward, with the acquisition of skill in cultivation and handling, a better article will be furnished, and the remuneration will be in proportion as this point is attained. Half the attention bestowed upon the culture and selection of choice varieties of cotton in its section, would here enable our farmers to rival the best flax growing districts of Europe. We have seen American flax equal in fineness to a choice article of Belgian growth worth twenty cents the pound. And crops have been raised in an adjoining State, which averaged eleven hundred pounds of dressed flax to the acre.

A once popular notion, that flax of a superior quality can only be produced by gathering the unripe plant and sacrificing the seed, is now exploded. Fineness of fibre is secured by proper cultivation, and thick sowing, with the careful selection and frequent charge of seed. And, to obtain strength of staple, it is important that the plant stand until it is matured. No other farm product better repays skillful attention. A distinguished agricultural writer, on a tour in Belgium, saw flax, the straw from an acre of which was of the value of $125. Flax crops, of such wonderful excellence, are there grown upon soils naturally inferior to those found upon the banks of the Connecticut. Until recently, the cultivation of flax in Ireland was conducted in a slovenly manner, but, by the introduction of choice seed and the Belgian improvements, much of the flax now grown in that country is equal in quality to any in the world.

In conclusion, with soil, climate, machinery, and market in our favor, and its perfected cultivation abroad for our example, why shall not flax become a leading American staple?

Hotel Building.

Under this head, the New York Tribune describes as follows a building to be erected in this city, divided into suits of apartments for families:—

"Its height will be eight stories, and its dimensions on the ground 200 feet square, with a court-yard in the centre, entered by a porte cochere. The exterior will be of iron, with inner walls, and partition walls of brick; it will be thoroughly fire-proof in every part; furnished with safe and commodious apparatus to transport the occupants from the ground to the eighth or to any intermediate story; replete with gas, baths, water-closets, ventilators, and every modern convenience, arranged in suits of apartments of different extent, and rented, furnished or unfurnished, as may be desired, at rates varying from $300 to $1,000 a year, with a restaurant from which meals will be served to order, at reasonable prices to those who prefer to take them in their own rooms; with splendid promenades on the lofty roof, or in a garden 50 feet by 200 below; with gymnasiums and ten pin alleys for ladies and gentlemen, and a conservatory of flowers, reading-rooms, ball-room, conversation-rooms, and every other convenient appendage to so large an establishment. Here it is estimated that a family of moderate income may live in a degree of elegance and comfort unattainable in separate houses, or in ordinary hotels, except by an exorbitant and impossible expenditure. The whole number of persons whom the house will accommodate, we suppose, will be about a thousand. The establishment will be erected by a joint stock company, incorporated under a general law recently passed; its cost will be $400,000, of which $125,000 will be required to buy the land."

Gypsum in the Far West.

The Fort Smith Herald publishes a letter from the pen of Dr. Shumard, of that place, who acted as Geologist in the expedition under Capt. Marcy, in his reconnoissance of the head waters of Red River. We give the material portions of the communication:—

This field is probably the largest in the world, and extends from the Wachita Mountains to within a short distance of the nearest Mexican Province. Throughout its entire extent the Gypsum presents itself to the surface in such a manner as to be very easily worked, and is of the purest quality. Not unfrequently we traveled for miles over continuous beds, which, from their snowy whiteness, and the great abundance of glittering Selenite (transparent Gypsum) they contained, added greatly to the interest of the scenery; while here and there immense bluffs—often several miles in extent, and thickly capped with the same material, projected to the hight of two or three hundred feet above the level of the surrounding country. In many places it was observed to be twenty feet in thickness.

Gypsum which, when burnt, produces the Plaster of Paris, is one of the most important substances in nature. Besides being one of the very best fertilizers of the soil, it is largely used for building and ornamental purposes, and is every year becoming more and more important, in a commercial point of view. Hence its discovery in inexhaustible quantities, cannot but be looked upon with the utmost degree of interest.

Effects of Drainage on the Temperature of the Soil.

All the rain that falls upon our fields must either be carried away by natural or artificial drainage, or having thoroughly saturated the soil on which it falls, be left upon the surface to be carried off by evaporation. Now, every gallon of water thus carried off by evaporation requires as much heat as would raise five and a half gallons from the freezing to the boiling point. Without going to extreme cases, the great effects of the heat thus lost upon vegetation cannot fail to be striking, and I have frequently found the soil of a field well drained higher in temperature from 10 to 15 degrees than that of another field which had not been drained, though in every other respect the soils were similar. I have observed the effects of this on the growing crop, and I have seen not only a much inferior crop on the undrained field, but that crop harvested fully three weeks after the other; and, owing to this circumstance and the setting in of unsettled weather, I have seen that crop deteriorated fully 10 per cent. in value. So says B. Simpson, in Journal Royal Agricultural Society.

In addition to the above arguments in favor of under-draining, says Professor Mapes, the legthened season of growth may be fairly taken into account. A field in the latitude of New York, thoroughly under-drained, is rendered thereby neaaly as early as one in Philadelphia left in its natural state, so far as under-drains are concerned. We find corn crops on such fields ripen much earlier; and turnips and other late crops planted on thoroughly under-drained soils are not so soon arrested in their growth by winter frosts. In addition to this, we assert, without the fear of contradiction, that one-third less manure of an organic kind will answer the purposes of a well under-drained acre, better than of one not so treated. [Plow, Loom and Anvil.

An Indian Type-Setter.

His fingers are small, and he picks up his type from the case with a rapidity truly astonishing. I have never seen it equaled in an English printing office. But his day's work over, (and he will get it done sometimes in two or three hours,) he is the most indolent and dissipated creature in existence. He is never out of debt, and never without a dun at his heels; but he invariably disputes all claims upon him, and never pays till he does so by some court. I required ten of these compositors, and engaged them at exactly double the rate of pay they receive in Calcutta. "Look at the distance," they would say; "to be so far from your families to whom you must send money, sir!" The compositors said they would require five distributors, In India a compositor never distributes his own matter. He would consider it beneath his dignity. Besides, it seems to soothe his feelings to have some one under him—a human being at his beck and call—somebody whom he may bully with impunity, and strike if it pleases him. These native distributors do not know a single word of English; many cannot tell you the names of the letters; but they will fill a case as speedily and as accurately as any European. [Dicken's Household Words.

Device of Belgian Smugglers.—The French Custom-House officers, stationed at Wallers, have just made an important seizure. A cart drawn by four horses, and apparently laden with coal, came from the Belgian frontier, and drew up at the Custom-House to be examined and obtain the usual pass. One of the officers, in verifying the contents of the cart, put his hands on what he thought to be an enormous block of coal, and to his great surprise found that he could lift it without difficulty. This led to a minute examination, when what appeared to be large masses of that combustible turned out to be boxes ingeniously coated over with coal, which was attached to them by cement. The cart in this way contained about 2,500 killogrammes of tobacco, and several thousands of excellent cigars. The cart and horses were also seized.

Education in Massachusetts.—The Governor of Massachusetts has approved an act, which provides for the establishment of forty-eight scholarships, to aid in educating young men for principal teachers in the high schools of the Commonwealth. The State is to be divided into school sections, and every town in these may recommend any one, or more, who will be fitted for College at the next commencement. From these, the Board of Education selects one out of each of the forty-eight classes, and provides for his education at any College in the State, receiving $100 annually for four years. After leaving College, he is bound to teach in the public schools a term equal to that for which he received the bounty.

Improvement.—It is recorded of Cicero, that writing to his friend Atticus on the quality of slaves, he said:—"Don't get your slaves from Britain; they are so stupid you cannot teach them anything!" This is not very complimentary to the ancestors of the two chief nations of the present time—but it shows how vastly races of men may be improved by time and culture. May it not also be used as a reply to those who defend the slavery of the negro, on the ground of his inferiority to his white masters? If the ancestors of these very masters were once accounted too stupid to be slaves, may not a thousand years of growth and Christian education place the negro of the present day on as proud an intellectual eminence as that to which the race which now oppresses him has attained? Who can deny the possibility?

The Franklin Fund in Boston.—The £1,000 left by Dr. Franklin to the city of Boston, to be let at an interest to young unmarried artisans, in sums not exceeding £30 sterling, now amounts to $15,280 55. Franklin estimated that it would reach $581,640 in one hundred years, but owing to losses it will probably reach $400,000. One provision of the will was, that when the fund should amount to $581,640, half a million of dollars should be appropriated to some public works, which should be judged to be of the most general utility to the inhabitants of Boston. The loans are now rarely applied for at all, and it is proposed that the fund be deposited in the Massachusetts Hospital Life Insurance Company and in the savings' banks of Boston.

Twenty Murders.—The following appears in the Courrier de Marseille: "Some persons who have just arrived from Toulon inform us that a horrible discovery had been made by the police of the town. For some time past public rumor signalized a house, occupied by an agent for finding substitutes for the army, as the theater of a series of atrocious dramas. Minute researches having been made, about 20 corpses, buried in the cellar of the house, were found. It appears that the victims were successively assassinated, and that the death of the first took place several years ago. The confession of a woman in her last moments placed, we are assured, justice on the trace of the crimes. The victims, according to the same person, were military substitutes received by the Conseils de Revision; and the man murdered them in order not to have to pay the price of their enrollment."

James Montgomery.—The poet Montgomery has made a collection of his Hymns, many of which, as they appear in the various denominational hymn-books, have been sadly mutilated and altered to suit the taste of the compilers. In this collection the poet has left them in the form in which he desires they should go down to posterity. Montgomery is now in his eighty-first year. A recent American traveler (Benjamin Moran) says, "He is a hale old man, in the enjoyment of a Govermental pension, and is quietly wearing out the thread of existence in Sheffield. Occasionally he attends public meetings, and gives both his time and money to aid and relieve the distresses of the poor."

VARIETY.

A correspondent of The Ohio Farmer has used a cheap and durable paint for the exterior of brick dwellings, which has already stood several years, and is now quite as fresh as when first applied. It consists simply of a lime-wash, with sulphate of zinc as a fixing ingredient. Any requisite shade is given by adding the colors used by house-painters. A clear and rich cream color may be obtained by applying yellow ochre to the common new brick. A livelier and warmer shade will be added by a little Venetian red. Burnt sienna may likewise be used. This paint is far cheaper than oil paint, and costs but little more than common whitewash.

Mr. Cyrus Baldwin, of Manchester, N. H., the inventor of the bag-loom now used in the Stark Mills, manufacturer, has invented two looms of wonderful construction, which get greater speed with less power. They have entirely a new shuttle motion, so that the shuttle can be stopped without stopping the loom. They do away with the use of cams, levers, treadles, pickers, and race-rods, thereby saving 75 per cent. of oil used about the looms. What is not less important, they can be used for weaving all kinds of fancy goods, with from one to twenty harnesses.—So says The Fitchburg Reveille.

The quince tree seems to have a constitutional fondness for salt. We have never seen, says the Horticulturist, such superb specimens of this fruit, and such a general luxuriance of the trees, as at Newport, R. I., on the sea-coast. A gentleman who noticed this fact several years ago, told us lately that he had profited by the hint, in giving to each of his trees a top-dressing of two quarts of coarse salt every spring. By scattering the salt over the surface it dissolves slowly, and does no harm whatever to the roots, but makes both foliage and fruit much more healthy.

A communication to the Legislature of California, from Hon. J. W. Denver, Secretary of State, gives a tabular statement of the number of Asiatics in each county in California. There are, according to this table, 22,175 Chinese; 1,125 Australians; 836 Sandwich Islanders; 39 New Zealanders; Manilla 6; Malays 28; Bombays 10; Hindoostan 4; Van Dieman's Land 5; Society Islands 21. In Toulumne County there are 2,486 Chinese; 46 Australians; 14 Sandwich Islanders; 4 New Zealanders, and 1 from Van Dieman's Land.

Congress has solemnly proscribed the alianthus tree. To the item in the Civil and Diplomatic bill, providing for setting out the public grounds in Washington with trees, is this condition: "That no more alianthus trees shall be purchased or planted in the public grounds." Congress seems to consider itself more wise than Providence.

A very slight declivity suffices to give the running motive to water. Three inches per mile, in a smooth, straight channel, gives a velocity of about three miles per hour. Now what is true of water is equally true of morals. The best of men only need a slight push from adversity to obtain a downhill momentum. Be careful, therefore, how you lose your equilibrium.

It is a fact that the number of persons annually destroyed by lightning is greater than the number of those who draw any considerable prize in a lottery; so that every man who buys a lottery ticket may have the comfortable reflection that whatever chance he has of drawing a prize he has a still greater chance of being killed by lightning!

American Sabbath Tract Society's Publications.

THE American Sabbath Tract Society publishes the following tracts, which are for sale at its Depository, No. 9 Spruce-st., N. Y., viz:—

No. 1—Reasons for introducing the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment to the consideration of the Christian Public. 28 pp.
No. 2—Moral Nature and Scriptural Observance of the Sabbath. 52 pp.
No. 3—Authority for the Change of the Day of the Sabbath. 24 pp.
No. 4—The Sabbath and Lord's Day: A History of their Observance in the Christian Church. 52 pp.
No. 5—A Christian Caveat to the Old and New Sabbatarians. 4 pp.
No. 6—Twenty Reasons for keeping holy, in each week, the Seventh Day instead of the First Day. 4 pp.
No. 7—Thirty-six Plain Questions, presenting the main points in the Controversy; A Dialogue between a Minister of the Gospel and a Sabbatarian; Counterfeit Coin. 8 pp.
No. 8—The Sabbath Controversy: The True Issue 4 pp.
No. 9—The Fourth Commandment: False Exposition 4 pp.
No. 10—The True Sabbath Embraced and Observed 16 pp.
No. 11—Religious Liberty Endangered by Legislative Enactments. 16 pp.
No. 12—Misuse of the Term Sabbath. 8 pp.
No. 13—The Bible Sabbath. 24 pp.
No. 14—Delaying Obedience. 4 pp.
No. 15—An Appeal for the Restoration of the Bible Sabbath, in an Address to the Baptists, from the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference. 40 pp.

The Society has also published the following works to which attention is invited:—

A Defense of the Sabbath, in reply to Ward on the Fourth Commandment. By George Carlow. First printed in London, in 1724; reprinted at Stonington, Ct., in 1802; now republished in a revised form. 168 pp.
The Royal Law Contended for. By Edward Stennet First printed in London, in 1658. 60 pp.
Vindication of the True Sabbath, by J. W. Morton, late Missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. 64 pp.
Also, a periodical sheet, quarto, The Sabbath Vindicator. Price $1 00 per hundred.

The series of fifteen tracts, together with Edward Stennett's "Royal Law Contended for," and J. W. Morton's "Vindication of the True Sabbath," may be had in a bound volume. Price 50 cents.

These tracts will be furnished to those wishing them for distribution or sale, at the rate of 15 pages for one cent. Persons desiring them can have them forwarded by mail or otherwise, on sending their address, with a remittance, to George B. Utter, Corresponding Secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

The Sabbath Recorder,

Published Weekly.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in Advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

The Sabbath-School Visitor,

Published Monthly.

Terms per Annum—Invariably in advance:

One copy	$ 25
Five copies to one address	1 00
Twelve copies to one address	2 00
Twenty copies to one address	3 00
Twenty-eight copies to one address	4 00
Forty copies to one address	5 00

The Seventh-day Baptist Memorial,

Published Quarterly.

Terms—$1 00 a Year, 25 Cents a Number.

Each number of the Memorial will contain a lithographic portrait of a Seventh-day Baptist preacher, together with a variety of historical, biographical, and statistical matter, designed to illustrate the rise, progress, and present condition of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Wood-cuts of meeting-houses will be introduced from time to time in connection with the history of the churches.

☞ Orders and remittances for the above should be addressed to the General Agent, George B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York

Postage.

The postage on the Sabbath Recorder is 13 cents a year in the State of New York, and 26 cents in any other part of the United States, payable quarterly or yearly in advance.

The postage on the Sabbath-School Visitor is 3 cents a year in the State of New York, and 6 cents in any other part of the United States, payable in advance.

The postage on the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial is 2 cents a year in any part of the United States when paid in advance, or 4 cents a year when not paid in advance.

THE BIBLE IN OUR COMMON SCHOOLS.

Number Three.

BY C. ROLLIN BURDICK, A. B.

When I commenced this series of articles for the Recorder, I intended to have continued them without interruption, through the successive numbers, until they were completed; but ill health and great pressure of business, being at the head of a very numerous school, prevented me. I will now proceed, with as little interruption as possible.

When I speak of the poetry of the Bible, and the themes it affords for the poet, I approach a subject perfectly enrapturing. To the pious soul, there is certainly nothing more delightful than the songs of Zion. Homer and Virgil, and even our own angelic Milton are outdone by this wondrous book. This is saying much for the poetry of the Bible—more by far than most critics are willing to admit; but there is such a majesty and simplicity, so charmingly mingled in the songs of the shepherd bard of Israel, as completely defies rivalry.

Poetry is the language of the imagination. The intellect sends abroad the fancy, over the boundless fields of thought that the universe affords, and it gathers up materials, and brings them and lays them at the feet of the imagination. The imagination seizes upon them, broods over them, warms them by the fires of immortal genius, blends them together in just symmetry and proportion, and sends them abroad to enrapture and charm. Thus, objects, the most opposite in their nature, by the molding power of this faculty, are so blended together as to produce the most agreeable emotions; and objects having no real resemblance, but possessing the power to produce similar emotions, are brought together, and their union is exceedingly agreeable. Take an example from Job.

> "Hast thou given the horse strength?
> Hast thou clothed his neck with thunder?"

There is obviously no real resemblance between the mane of the war-horse and thunder; yet the war-horse, rushing with impetuosity upon the foe, and overturning all in his way, conveys an idea of power and creates emotions similar to those produced by the unchained thunder, careering through the sky, and riding upon the storm-cloud. There are many such passages in the Bible.

Another characteristic of the imagination is that power by which it takes inanimate objects and clothes them with animate existence —by which it sends mountains skipping like rams, and little hills like lambs, over the plains —that power which makes the cedars of Lebanon rejoice, and the forest trees clap their hands for joy—that power which makes the deserts and waste places sing for joy, and the morning stars raise their exulting songs of praise to God for his glorious dispensations to his creatures. Joyful, indeed, must have been the emotions of the sacred poets, to have inspired their minds with such images.

Another characteristic of the imagination is the power of combining numbers, and representing them as a unity. This is abundantly illustrated in the Bible. One passage will suffice.

> "How beautiful are thy tents, O Jacob,
> And thy dwelling places, O Israel;
> As rivers spread themselves abroad,
> As gardens by the river side.
> He coucheth and lieth down as a lion,
> As a young lion who shall rouse him up.
> Blessed is he that blesseth thee,
> And cursed is he that curseth thee."

The beauty of this consists in representing the numerous hosts of Israel as one man, and thus addressing them. Making the mind of youth familiar with such poetic sallies will lay the foundation of a correct taste, and thus be an invaluable advantage to them in whatever sphere of life they may move.

The reader will suffer me to indulge in a few more quotations, and then I will leave this part of my subject.

The prophet, sickened, as may well be supposed, to his heart's core, by the misery and wretchedness of mankind—and beholding, by the far-reaching ken of prophecy, the deliverer coming in the remote future, breaks forth into the following soul-stirring strain:—

> "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace; that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation; that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth. Thy watchmen shall lift up the voice; with the voice together shall they sing; for they shall see eye to eye when the Lord shall bring again Zion. Break forth into joy; sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem; for the Lord hath comforted his people; he he hath redeemed Jerusalem. The Lord hath made bare his holy arm in the eyes of all nations; and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God."

If I ever read any thing in any language that perfectly delights me, it is this passage. It enables me to see the deliverer approaching to save, not amid the tumult and thunder of battle, where the groans and shrieks of the dying fill the air, where banners are waving and falchions gleaming, but clothed in the white robes of peace, and bearing the olive branch in his hand. Nature herself is renovated by his smiles; deserts and waste places sing together, and all the ends of the earth rejoice, to see the salvation of God.

Another glorious, soul-stirring song, is the song of the angelic choristers on Bethlehem's plains—their song of "Glory to God in the highest, and on the earth peace and good will to man."

Standing high among the literary recommendations of the Bible, is its richness of themes for the poet. Where can we find a book so rich in such themes? Echo answers, Where? It is no small recommendation, that the sublimest genius that ever honored humanity drew his theme for that miracle of a poem, "Paradise Lost," from this glorious book. A numerous host in Apollo's train have drawn their themes from this book of books. Yet by no means are its themes exhausted. It is still rich as the mines of Ophir, and exhaustless as eternity itself. Let us contemplate, for a moment, some of them.

Let us go back on the stream of time to that period when this now bright and beautiful earth was a formless void—a mass of black and sulphurous lava—when the atmosphere which enveloped it was so filled with exhalations, that not a solitary ray of light could penetrate the grim darkness that dwelt upon the face of the deep; and thence trace the work of creation as it progressed towards perfection. What scenes of thrilling interest burst upon the vision! At the voice of the Almighty, order succeeds disorder, the curtain of darkness is rolled back, light for the first time bursts upon the infant world, and beauty and harmony spring out of confusion and distortion. Such themes of contemplation are worthy of an angel's pen. It is well for youth to become familiar with such themes, as they are calculated to inspire the mind with just notions of what constitutes the true basis of poetry.

Another theme—the Deluge. What a theme for the poet! God, worried out by the sins of men, resolved upon their destruction. The heavens were opened, and down rushed the storms. The fountains of the great deep were unloosed, and earth became another wreck. What poet has ever depicted the horror and anguish that must have pierced the hearts of men, when, amid the groans of the earthquake, the glare of lurid lightnings, the bellowing of angry thunders, and the universal concussion of the elements, with eyes glaring wild with inexorable despair, they read their doom, irrevocable as the fiat of an unchanging God could make it? Who has painted the desolation that reigned over that wide waste of waters which rolled over the charnel house of all living, except those alone in the ark? Echo answers, Who? None have been able to do justice to the task.

The passage of the children of Israel through the Red Sea—the giving of the law from Mount Sinai—Elijah's ascension to heaven in a chariot of fire—are themes from which the best might win fresh laurels. But the crowning theme is the crucifixion of Christ —an event upon which hung the eternal destiny of millions—an event around which cluster all the dearest hopes of the Christian—an event which furnishes themes of song for the seraphim and cherubim around the dazzling throne of God—an event which the redeemed, especially, shall celebrate in ecstatic strains, nor shall these songs cease until their echoes shall be borne back to the listening ear from the remotest shores of eternity's boundless ocean. Let us follow Christ from the Hall of Judgment up the hill of Calvary, and behold his mild and resigned countenance, all bespattered with his own blood, and with the filth which his enemies had cast upon him; behold him bearing his cross, and fainting under his heavy load; behold him nailed to that cruel instrument of death, and reared up between the heaven and the earth, as if fit for neither; behold him crying out, under the angry frowns of an offended God, brought upon him by the sins of men, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"—behold him expiring under his accumulated sufferings, amid the scoffs and jeers of his enemies; and listen to the voice of the earthquake, as the earth shakes from center to circumference, indignant at the sins of man. This is a theme which can never be exhausted by any created being. Yet the more we contemplate it, independent even of its moral bearing, the more are we capable of appreciating the genius of poetry. "It may be doubted," says an able writer, "whether even Milton's sublime genius could have worthily represented to mortal eyes that terrible crisis in the destiny of man. Sublime as were the flights of that eagle genius—and what intellect ever soared

> 'With plume so strong, so equal, and so soft,' into the loftiest empyrean of poetry, the unshadowed glory of heaven's eternal atmosphere, the flower-breathing air of primeval Eden, or the thick darkness of hell?—it must have flagged—even that tireless pinion, amid the gloom and thunder-cloud that veiled the more than human agonies of the cross."

REGENERATION.

Reply to T. B. B.—See Recorder, May 12.

In the first four paragraphs of T. B. B.'s reply to my views on Regeneration, he quotes some of my propositions, and in his commentary thereon he makes me arrive at the following conclusion: "So, then, according to D. E. M., we have a natural man, dead in trespasses and sins—that is, one in whom there is no holiness at all—putting forth a holy act, and intending to do so." To this sentiment I unhesitatingly plead guilty, and am ready for trial, before the tribunal of reason and revelation. T. B. B. takes issue against this sentiment as follow: "If this intention is a holy one, it cannot be the act of the natural or unrenewed man."

Before proceeding with the investigation of this issue, let us review a little, to see how it has arisen.

The reader will recollect that I assumed, in my former article, that regeneration consisted in a change from unholiness to holiness, or from sin to obedience; and that the Holy Spirit performed the important agency of enlightening the mind by applying to it the word of truth, after which the change was entirely the work of the subject. On the other hand, it was assumed, that the Holy Spirit, or God, was the sole agency engaged in the work. It is now affirmed, that an unholy being cannot put forth a holy or obedient act, and consequently is made holy by the Spirit alone, and thus regeneration is completely wrought, while the sinner is yet disobedient; and it is more than intimated, that the sinner may not even know that this change is wrought. This doctrine, absurd enough in itself, will appear still more so from a single consideration of the nature of holiness.

Holiness is not an abstraction, having a separate identity, and existing independent of the mind, but it is an act of mind, in some mode of manifestation. It is an act of free will, put forth in accordance with known obligation. If this is not holiness, then neither T. B. B. nor the Bible has told us what it is. Thus giving to holiness "a local habitation and a name," my position does not seem so strange as T. B. B.'s exclamation point would seem to make it. It is simply this, that the disobedient or unholy man can, at any moment of his responsible existence, cease to be disobedient or unholy, and become obedient or holy. It is upon this very unholy being that God lays his injunction to become holy. It will not answer to charge God with the absurdity of calling upon the sinner to do what he cannot do; nor has God ever intimated that he should do any more for the sinner than to show him the way to obedience, or holiness, as I shall prove hereafter. But it is assumed, that "this holy intention is the product or effect of the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit, and shows that the work has already been accomplished. According to this view, the sinner becomes a holy being before he even puts forth a holy intention; but according to my view, he cannot possibly be a holy being until he puts forth this holy intention; for it is this very intention which constitutes his holiness, and at all times he can put forth that intention. Now, if my definition of holiness is correct, my conclusion is inevitable. I am confident that this definition will stand the test of the severest criticisms.

I freely admit, that the work of the Holy Spirit stands in intimate relationship to this change of intention, which makes the new creature; but that it is the relationship of "cause," as T. B. B. asserts, I deny, and appeal to the word of God for testimony. It is the relationship of condition, and not of cause. The office of the Spirit, as defined by the Bible, is to awaken and convince the sinner, by applying the truth to his intelligence. When it has done this, it has completed its mission, and yet the sinner is not regenerated. The truth may pour upon his soul with noonday effulgence, and yet, instead of being any more holy in consequence of this work of the Spirit, his guilt increases with the light, nor is he at all regenerate till he obeys that truth.

For the Scripture explanation of the office of the Holy Spirit, see Gen. 6: 3—"My Spirit shall not always strive with man." Job 36: 9—"He showeth them their work, and their transgressions." John 16: 8—"And when he (the Spirit) is come, he will reprove (convince) the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment." Neh. 9: 20—"Thou gavest also thy good Spirit to instruct them." John 14: 26—"The Holy Ghost, whom the father will send in my name, shall teach you all things." Such is the office of the Holy Spirit—not to regenerate, but to teach the truth, that men may have no excuse for their unholiness. If they remain unholy, still it is because they will, and not because they must.

In the performance of this office, the Bible every where represents the Spirit as coöperating with man in the work of regeneration. 1st Pet. 1: 22—"Seeing ye have purified your souls, in obeying the truth, through the Spirit, unto unfeigned love of the brethren." Such is the way, as I have learned it from the Word of God; and until T. B. B. shall point out the way more perfectly, his prayer that I "may learn the way of the Lord more perfectly" will remain unanswered.

From the sixth paragraph of T. B. B.'s reply, it appears that he also claims and teaches that to "cease to do evil and learn to do well—to learn off unholiness, and put on holiness—is entirely the work of the creature." But that this is no part of regeneration. The sinner is entirely regenerated prior to this change of moral character. This change he calls "conversion." Now, since the Bible teaches of no change except this change of moral character, which T. B. B. calls conversion, I of course cannot understand the distinction in the mind of my opponent, until he shall define regeneration, as clearly as he has conversion. This distinction between regeneration and conversion finds no sanction in the philosophy of the human mind, or the teachings of the Scriptures. The terms regeneration and conversion are not of frequent use in the Bible, but when used they are of synonymous import. The term regeneration means the "new birth." To be regenerated is to have a "new heart," to be a "new creature," to "pass from death unto life." It is then a change of moral character. But a change of moral character is a change of the intentions from disobedience to obedience, and this change he is to make for himself. Ezek. 18: 31—"Cast away from you all your transgressions, whereby ye have transgressed, and make you a new heart, and a new spirit, for why will ye die?" No commentary can make this beautifully expressive passage more clear. The making of the "new heart" consists in casting off transgressions, and this is enjoined upon the transgressor. The Bible nowhere defines the new heart to be any thing else than a heart free from transgressions. Now the term conversion is used with precisely this same import, to express this same change of heart, this passing from death unto life. Psalm 51: 13— "Then will I teach transgressors thy ways, and sinners shall be converted to thee." Acts 28: 27—"The heart of this people waxed gross, and their ear is dull of hearing and their eyes have they closed, lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their hearts, and should be converted, and I should heal them." Here the whole process of regeneration, with the agencies employed, is clearly set forth, by which the sinner passes from death unto life, so as to obtain healing from God; and this process is called conversion. The knowledge of the truth is the condition, (and, as I have shown, this is imparted by the Spirit;) turning to God (conversion) is the thing done by the subject; and healing from God the result. Such is the process of the new birth, and the only process mentioned in the Bible, and it is expressed by both terms alike, when single terms are used to express it.

The comparison which T. B. B. makes of the regeneration of the sinner to the resurrection of Lazarus, proves nothing, for want of analogy in the cases. It is true, that miracle was wrought through the means of words; and so was the world created by means of words. The nothing out of which God made the world, was not a moral agent, and consequently was under the law of necessity. So was the dead body of Lazarus. By an act of omnipotent power, it was reëndowed with vital energy and conscious existence, and then he came a moral agent again. Now, no such act of omnipotence is necessary to make the sinner capable of obeying the truth, or a moral agent, for he is just as much a moral agent, and capable of obeying God, before his regeneration as after; and his eternal damnation is threatened if he refuses to obey; and if he be damned, it will be because, having the complete ability to be holy, he still would not do so. God, in the exercise of his functions as moral governor of mankind, could not regenerate the sinner, or turn his will, without destroying the glorious attribute of free will, with which he has created him. In the exercise of this, the sinner may obey or not, just as he pleases; but not so with the dead body of Lazarus.

The reference to the case of Nicodemus is not more fortunate, since it proves nothing concerning the mode or agencies of regeneration, but only its necessity. T. B. B. says that this man "knew that it was necessary for a sinner to amend his life, as well as any body;" and then asks, "Did he (Christ) urge upon Nicodemus what he already knew to be necessary?" Yes, if he knew that ever so well, Christ urged it upon him in the following words: "He that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God."

Lastly, T. B. B. attempts to prove, that "Regeneration is more than a change from disobedience to obedience," by reference to an anecdote "in last week's Recorder, entitled "The Physician Healed." He very kindly advises me to "read and ponder the lesson which it teaches." I have done so, and find it to teach, that a certain clergyman neglected to learn what are the evidences of regeneration, as given in the Bible, and thought himself regenerated when he was not. I think that clergyman must have been a Calvinist, taught to believe that regeneration was a certain undefinable something, brought about without any of his own agency; for if he had been taught the true theory, I think he could not have been mistaken, since that represents him as having taken part in the work himself. The reader may judge which theory would be most likely to "build up such self-deceived persons, and keep them in profound ignorance of the unsearchable riches of Christ." But, in the use of this anecdote, T. B. B. has fallen into an error worse than that which he sought to prove by the use of it. He says of this deceived clergyman, "Through riches of divine grace he was afterwards made a subject of the new birth, yet it does not appear that he was any more OBEDIENT THAN BEFORE." Now, this statement, monstrous enough in itself, appears doubly so when transcribed by the same pen which but a few moments before taught that the unregenerate man was dead in trespasses and sins, or disobedience, and that obedience was the RESULT of regeneration. Now, verily, obedience cannot be the result of regeneration, if a man is just as obedient before regeneration as after. Nay, more, if a man is already obedient, there is no need of regeneration at all; for it is the very purpose of regeneration to secure this obedience. The truth is, that neither this clergyman, nor any other unregenerate man, ever obeys God at all; for obedience, be it well remembered, consists not in outward actions, but in ultimate intentions. I pray that T. B. B. may teach the way of the Lord more perfectly. D. E. M.

THE WORTH OF HOURS.

MILNES.

Believe not that your inner eye
Can ever in just measure try
The worth of hours as they go by.

For every man's weak self, alas!
Makes him to see them while they pass,
As through a dim or tinted glass.

But if, with earnest care, you would
Mete out to each its part of good,
Trust rather to your after mood.

Those surely are not fairly spent,
That leave your spirit bowed and bent
In sad unrest and ill content.

And more; though free from seeming harm
You rest from toil of mind or arm,
Or slow retire from pleasure's charm—

If then a painful sense comes on
Of something wholly lost and gone,
Vainly enjoyed or vainly done;

Of something from your being's chain
Broke off, not to be linked again
By all mere memory can retain;

Upon your heart this truth may rise;
Nothing that altogether dies
Suffices man's just destinies.

So should we live, that every hour
May die as dies the natural flower,
A self-reviving thing of power;

That every thought and every deed
May hold within itself the seed
Of future good and future need;

Esteeming sorrow, whose employ
Is to develop not destroy,
Far better than a barren joy.

GENEALOGICAL SERMON.

I had, at one time, for a co-curate a very impulsive and rather democratic man. Our rector was an aristocrat. One Sunday he had delivered himself of a sermon in which he incidentally justified family pride, and spoke in a manner that must have been offensive to any poor person present, of any intelligence or independence; and as we were leaving the church, my brother curate exclaimed, with unaffected indignation, "Well, that crowns ——'s toadying discourses. Such things are intolerable. But I'll administer an antidote next Sunday; see if I don't. Like Herod's worms, our rector's pride is eating him up." I did not attempt to dissuade him. Our rector treated both of us with a condescension that was anything but flattering; and he thought more of being a "gentleman" (upon which he was always indirectly vaunting himself) than of being a Christian, forgetting what Coleridge said, that there was no real gentleman without he was a Christian.

Next Sunday morning my brother curate carried out his threat. He told me nothing about how he proposed to manage or mold his course; so judge my surprise when, mounting the pulpit, he gave out as his text, the 3d chapter of Luke, part of the 23d, and the whole of the 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th, 31st, 32d, 33d, 34th, 35th, 36th, 37th, and 38th verses; "in which (he continued) will be found the following words;" and then, to the marvel of the whole congregation, who turned towards the pulpit with eyes and mouth open, he read the whole of the sixteen verses, beginning with—"Joseph, which was the son of Heli," and ending with, "which was the son of Enos, which was the son of Seth, which was the son of Adam, which was the son of God." Every one is familiar with the peculiar and strange effect upon the ear of the repetition of the words, "which was the son," even when occurring in the reading-desk; but in the pulpit, as a prefix to a sermon in the shape of a text, they sounded oddly. The rector looked to me for an explanation, and I did not know where to look; while the principal persons of the parish manifestly came to the conclusion that my brother curate was gone mad. But if he were, he soon showed them that there was method in his madness; for he ingeniously evolved out of these sixteen verses a discourse that might have served as an essay on the Republican legend of "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity." The reader has probably anticipated me in the use he made of his long text.

"Here (said he) we have a genealogical tree, not traced by the flattery of scycophants nor the uncertainty of heralds, but by the unerring Evangelist, whose inspiration enabled him to mount from branch to branch—a genealogy beginning with God, and ending, as far as my text goes, with a poor Galilean carpenter. Here is a lesson and a rebuke for the pride of descent. The poorest carpenter, in the poorest village of England, can retrace his lineage through the same unbroken succession; and the proudest peer can do no more, unless the latter, in his presumption, should be disposed to ignore his divine origin. But it would be no use; by whatever different branches, they arrive at the same root; the noble and the peasant, if both had the power of going back over their ancestry, would both meet at the 38th verse of the 3d chapter of Luke, 'Which was the son of Enos, which was the son of Seth, which was the son of Adam, which was the son of God.'

"Here (he continued, looking at the rector's and the squire's pews)—here we all meet on equal terms. Disown them as we like in other degrees, here we are brought face to face with, and can no longer refuse to acknowledge our poor relations."

Then, looking to some forms on which a group of alms-house people sat he continued:

"Here, too, my poor friends, you and your 'superiors' meet in the presence of your common parent, the Great God of heaven and earth, in whose eyes the factitious distinctions of the world are nought. Cold-shoulder you as they like through life, they cannot ignore their relationships when they come to this; they can no longer speak of you, spurn you, as though you were formed of different clay. The carpenter and the king are one; and how little importance St. Luke, who was no sycophantic genealogist, attaches even to the regal office, may be seen from the manner in which he passes through the 31st verse, where no pause is made to mark the proud title of David, which was merely the son of Jesse, which was the son of Obed, and so on."

In conclusion, he urged the poor man to live up to his great origin, and not disentitle himself to that great share in the inheritance of which his Heavenly Father had laid up for his children who truly serve him. They need not care for the proud man disowning them now; the thing to be feared was God disowning them on the last day. The rich he enjoined to feel for the poor as for brothers, if they would not offend that great Being who has a father's interest for all.

I thought the rector would never forgive my co-curate; but the only notice he took of the eccentric discourse was to cease forever after preaching to the "humbler orders," of the deference they owed their "superiors." It was before so bad that a neighboring clergyman said to me, "If your rector had to put on an eleventh commandment, it would run thus: "Thou shalt not neglect to take off thy hat to myself and the squire."

ANECDOTE OF MATTHEW WILKES.

Wilkes was a cotemporary of Rowland Hill, but unlike him was of obscure origin, and had the advantages of a most common education. The former, amid his eccentricity, was all grace, the latter was equally eccentric, but awkward and coarse. "Hill's mind was more highly cultivated; but Wilkes' intellect was probably stronger—certainly he was more sagacious and far-seeing. They labored side by side—the one in Surrey Chapel, the other alternately in Tottenham Court Chapel and in the Tabernacle, for about half a century. Both were eminently blessed in their labors; both were highly gifted and eccentric men; both enjoyed, through a long life, an unsullied reputation; and the memories of both are still deeply embalmed in the affection and gratitude of thousands." The following anecdote illustrates the character of Wilkes:—

There was nothing for which he had a more cordial abhorrence than any exhibition of dandyism in young ministers; and nothing of this kind ever came in contact with him without meeting a rebuke. On one occasion, a young minister, of a good deal of flourish and pretension, went from the country to London, and carried Mr. Wilkes a letter, which was designed to procure for him an invitation to preach.

"Well, young man," said Matthew, with a nasal twang that is perfectly indescribable, but which nobody who has heard it can ever forget, "Well, young man, you want to preach—you want to preach in London, don't you?"

"I am going to pass a few days here, sir, and if it should suit Mr. Wilkes' convenience, I should be very happy to give his people a sermon, while I am here."

"Well," replied Matthew, "you can preach—you can preach—come along next Wednesday morning to the Tabernacle, and I'll meet you there, and you can take my lecture for that morning,"

The young man agreed to do so, and was on the spot at the appointed hour. Matthew met him at the door, disgusted, as he had been before, with his dandy airs, and addressed him thus—"Go along into the pulpit, young man, and I shall sit below and look at you, and hear every word you say."

The young preacher darted through the aisle into the pulpit, in a manner that seemed better to befit a ball-room than a place of worship. He performed the introductory service with an air of insufferable self-complacency, and in due time opened the Bible and read his text, which was the last verse of the first chapter of the gospel by John: "Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man." He had written his sermon, and committed it all to memory, as he supposed, to a word; but unfortunately had left his manuscript behind him. When he had read his text, he found it imposible to recall the first sentence. He hesitated and hemmed, and began thus—"You perceive, my brethren—you perceive—that the angels of God—are here represented—as ascending —and descending." He then set up a good stout cough, in the hope that his memory might get to work in the meantime; but the cough was as unproductive as it was artificial, and he could do nothing but go right over again, with the absurd sentence with which he had started. He coughed again and again, but his memory was in too profound a slumber to be awakened by it. After three or four minutes, during which he was a spectacle to the congregation, and especially to Matthew, who was all the time watching and listening, according to his promise, he shut up his Bible in perfect consternation, and abruptly closed the service. Of course, he came out of the pulpit with a very different air from that with which he entered it. But the worst was yet to come—he had to meet Matthew, and hear his scathing comments.

"Well, well," said he, "young man, you've preached—you've preached in London—han't you? I've heard you; I've heard every word you've said—and I've only just one comment to make—if you had *as*cended as you *de*scended, then you might have *de*scended as you *as*cended."

It is needless to say, that the young man was, by this time, cured of his ambition for preaching in the Tabernacle.

Another young minister, of a similar character, paid him a visit, and Matthew observed that he sported what he thought a very indecent number of watch-seals. He eyed them for some time, as if he were scrutinizing the material of which they were made, and then said, with a terribly sarcastic air, "It seems to me that you've a good many seals to your ministry, considering how young you are."

CHRYSOSTOM.—When the Empress Eudoxia lay in wait for the life of Chrysostom, he expressed his religious confidence and firmness in the following words, part of a letter to Cyriacus:—"Will the Empress cause me to be sawn asunder? Even so was it with the prophet Isaiah. Will she cast me into the sea? I will think of Jonah. Will she throw me into a fiery furnace? I will think of the three men. Will she give me up to the wild beasts? I will think of Daniel in the lion's den. Will she cut off my head? I shall have John for my companion. Will she cause me to be stoned? So it happened to Stephen. Will she take away all my goods? I care not; naked I came into the world, naked must I go out of it."

REGENERATION.

Reply to D. E. M.—See First Page.

I begin with your attempt to convict me of self-contradiction. I said of the deceived clergyman, who was afterwards made a subject of the New Birth, that "it did not appear that he became any more obedient than he was before"—a statement which you regard as "monstrous enough in itself," and as "appearing doubly so, when transcribed by the same pen which, but a few moments before, taught that the unregenerate man was dead in trespasses and sins, or disobedience, and that obedience was the result of regeneration." But however "monstrous" it may appear to you, I trust that, when you shall have become better instructed in the way of the Lord, and, especially, made more sensible of that superlative deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the heart which constitutes the necessity for regeneration, you will moderate your confidence a little. It required no depth of penetration to discover, that the obedience rendered by the clergyman before he was renewed by grace, which I supposed to compare favorably with what he rendered afterward, was that kind of obedience which every person gives who desires to justify himself by his own righteousness. That such obedience may be as zealously rendered, and exact in all its outward manifestations—nay, that it may be connected with as sincere desire to stand righteous before God—as in the case of persons truly regenerate, is not quite so "monstrous" a statement, when viewed in the light of Scripture, as you have imagined. In proof of this, let me call your attention to a few passages.

Paul testifies, that he was, previous to his renewal by grace, "touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless." Phil. 3: 6. You may put what construction upon this passage you choose; but unless you can have the temerity (which I am sure you will not) to say, that the Apostle's language was "monstrous," there is a sense in which he was justified in using it. And when it is borne in mind, that the Apostle represents himself as having been, while yet unrenewed, a very zealous man, (Gal. 1: 14,) a very conscientious man, (Acts 23: 1,) and as toiling with all his might to justify himself before God, I think it will be difficult to say, that his conformity to the divine requisitions was not exact enough to justify him in pronouncing himself to have been "blameless."

You will also call to mind the case of the young man, who came to our Saviour, with much anxiety, to know what he should do to obtain eternal life. What a moral man he had been from his youth up! How obedient to the commandments! He had kept them all. He had toiled most zealously to render himself blameless; and such was the perfection of his moral character, that the Saviour even "loved him."

Paul's reference to his brethren, his "kinsmen according to the flesh," may be also adduced. He "bears them record, that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge." Rom. 10: 2. How was their zeal manifested? In going about to establish their own righteousness, (verse 3,) a thing which required a good deal of carefulness. I doubt not there were many among them quite as zealous, quite as exact in their behaviour, quite as "blameless," as the Apostle himself had been before his conversion.

You may say in reference to these cases, and all others of like character, that their obedience was not perfect—that it "lacked" at least "one thing"—that it was wanting in something to make it endure the test of the law. But what less could you say of regenerate persons? Even their obedience does not embody all the elements of perfect holiness. It is far from being perfect. Christians are coming short every day of their lives; and I have no doubt that the sins of Christians are even more odious, more provoking, to the eyes of Infinite Holiness, than the sins committed by the unregenerate. For they have this aggravation, that they are committed notwithstanding the gracious manifestations which God has made to their souls. And Christians stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God, not because they are any more obedient than many who are strangers to the New Birth, but because the Gospel is, from first to last, a system of grace.

I repeat it, the Gospel is, from first to last, a system of grace. And grace does not mean works, in any sense of the term. The Apostle takes such pains to put the two in direct opposition to each other, (Rom. 11: 6,) that it is wonderful how those who profess to have been taught of God will, nevertheless, talk about the obedience of the Christian, as if it had something to do in the way of purchasing eternal life. Unquestionably, the lack of obedience on the part of Christians is infinitely displeasing to the Most High, for he hates sin wherever it exists; but the performance of it, however conducive to the welfare of others, avails not one jot or tittle towards turning away the curse from their souls. And were it not that Jesus Christ stands between them and God, shields them from wrath by his atoning sacrifice, and covers them with his own righteousness, they must, notwithstanding their regeneration, sink deeper in perdition than the most abandoned wretches who never knew the grace of God. God accepts none of their works, however perfect, except through, and for the sake of, his Son the Redeemer.

The true difference between the regenerate and the unregenerate is this: the one delights in God, and especially in those manifestations which he makes of himself in the Gospel, while the other does not. It is not merely in the Divine Being, absolutely considered, that the new-born soul finds his delight, as your definition implies, but in that Divine Being as he is manifested in Jesus Christ. "Christ is all, and in all." Col. 3: 11. It matters not how sincerely the sinner may turn from his disobedience to obedience, nor how perfect his subsequent obedience may be, nor what his "ultimate intentions;" if his obedience is not attended with delight in God as revealed in Christ—a sweet resting in him who is the end of the law for righteousness to believers—he lacks the one thing which marks him out as a truly regenerate person. The babe does not more instinctively turn to its mother's breast, than does the new-born child of God to the milk of love and grace which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

I must insist on this point, because it is the one in which your definition is singularly deficient. It is on this account that I pray that you may learn the way of the Lord more perfectly; and whether my prayer be answered, or not, I cannot help feeling some anxiety, when I see the young men of our denomination lending themselves to the support of doctrine, the tendency of which is anything but salutary.

But I will not leave this point of the subject, without expressing myself so as to be understood. If language has any power, you shall know what I mean. That kind of obedience which is attended with true delight in God, and a sweet resting of the soul on Jesus as "the Lord our Righteousness," is the result of regeneration. There is no such obedience as this, where regeneration has not already taken place. But that kind of obedience which is found in those who "go about to establish their own righteousness"—an obedience which may be, and often is, attended with many fastings, and prayers, and covenant vows written in blood, as in the case of the deceived clergyman—is not the result of regeneration.

I reserve the remainder of my remarks for another occasion. T. B. B.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday Sanctification—Jewish Disabilities—Involuntary Nuns—The British Museum.

GLASGOW, May 13, 1853.

Notwithstanding all the efforts made for the maintenance of Sunday sanctification, and their boasted success, it requires no very close observation to discover that practically the tendencies are in an opposite direction. In farther illustration of this, we observe, that in our Tontine Hotel an adjourned meeting was held, this week, of persons "favorable to starting a first-class steamboat to ply between Glasgow and certain points of the west coast, in the morning and evening of Sundays. Subscriptions, which were stated to amount already to £245 10s., were agreed upon, to form a fund guaranteeing indemnity against loss to the Company, from whom the vessel should be chartered. This is the first attempt that has been made to establish Sunday pleasure sailing, avowedly, on the Clyde. Individual trips have been taken, on pretext of conveying persons to the Communion at one of the coast towns. These, indeed, were continued for several years, but only on such occasions. As the Liverpool and Dublin steamers are arranged to make Sunday a sailing day, and thus save, as far as possible, the other days for business, it has also been common, when the state of the tide did not admit of large vessels coming at once to the harbor, to bring up the passengers on Sunday by a smaller river vessel. In the present movement, however, the avowed object is regular Sunday traffic; and it was affirmed at the meeting, that the River Trustees have neither the power nor the inclination to prevent it. But if permitted to sail at all, it will be because the ancient laws for Sunday protection are being allowed to fall into disuetude; for that a power exists to prevent it according to statute is unquestionable. The power or the disposition in the matter is likely to be tried, as a large Committee was appointed to carry out the object contemplated.

The rejection of a Bill facilitating the admission of Jews to the House of Commons, as members, by the House of Lords, has been generally regarded with dissatisfaction. It is the seventh time that they have so decided, and on some of the former occasions by much larger majorities than on this, when it was decided by 164 against 115. But although carried in the Lower House, out of the discussion there has resulted a duel between Sir Robert Peel and Mr. B. Osborne, Secretary to the Admiralty. The speech of the former was intemperate, and that of the latter in reply was bitterly personal—so that the honor of the parties, and the Christian character of our Legislature, could only be vindicated aright, in the estimation of these two legislators, by their going to some quiet spot and shooting at each other. Seeing the Christian principle on which they acted made such a sad requirement, it is well that neither of these martyrs in intention sustained personal injury—although the young baronet's coat-tail was perforated by his antagonist's ball. Immediately after the Parliamentary decision against a Jewish legislator who would not take the oath "on the true faith of a Christian," the case of Mr. Salomon, who voted several times in the House of Commons without that qualification, came on for decision in the Exchequer Chamber, and has been decided against him. The fine of £500 for one vote (he being tried only on one, to decide the cause,) was decreed against him.

In the House of Commons, Mr. T. Chambers, this week, moved for leave to bring in a Bill, to facilitate the recovery of personal liberty for persons involuntarily confined in monasteries or nunneries—in the number of which class of buildings, there has been a sad increase of late years. Females, more especially, he stated, are known to be kept in these subject to coërcion. The motion was opposed by Lord John Russell, who strangely argued as if the object of the motion had been to prevent females from becoming nuns, when, under the influence of their superstition, they were decoyed into these prisons, instead of being a motion to afford opportunity to those who, in ignorance or under misleading, had been induced to become inmates, and whose experience undeceived them, and led them to desire their liberty again. Notwithstanding Government opposition, the motion was carried by a majority of 138 against 115. The previous day a petition was presented to the House of Lords for the Registration and Inspection of such houses, when both Dr. Whately, Archbishiop of Dublin, and the Bishop of Norwich, gave recent instances within their personal knowledge, of persons restrained and concealed from their friends. It was, therefore, properly argued, that it is necessary that there be some legalized mode of inquiry as to the treatment of inmates, and means afforded to those inmates of imparting information as to their condition. All our historical acquaintance with the Church of Rome convinces us that such a measure is indispensably necessary, if such places are permitted to exist; and, indeed, it is only about six weeks since we were informed of six nuns, including the Superior of their Convent, in France, having been secretly conveyed away, and their place of confinement concealed from their friends—the secret imprisonment having been occasioned, as was well understood, by the fact, previously known to their friends, that they had become Protestants. But Rome has rewards to bestow, as well as punishments to inflict. Accordingly, Dr. Newman, who, in the beginning of the year, was fined £100, in the Queen's Bench, for libelling Dr. Achilli, has just received, apparently as the reward of his slander, a "special blessing" from the Pope, in the Pope's own hand-writing—a condescension, it would appear, not often shown.

The Annual Accounts relating to the British Museum have been lately printed in a Parliamentary paper. The estimate of the sum required for the ensuing year is £55,840; that granted for the past year was £52,343. The number of visitors, from Christmas, 1851, till Christmas, 1852, was 507,973. In the preceding year, the number was 2,527,216—the great difference having been occasioned by the influx of strangers from the provinces and from abroad, on account of the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park. But the number last year was less, by several hundred thousands, than the average of a number of years previous. On Easter Monday, this year, the number of visitors was 26,587, being an increase of 7,000 over last year. In the estimates for the year, only £5,000 is asked for books for the Library—being only half of that for last year—the reason being, that there is too little room in the building for what would otherwise have been added. At the end of last year, an addition was made to the Catalogue of 57 volumes folio, in manuscript, comprising only "Music, and names of authors of Words set to Music." Last year, the number of "visits" made to the Reading-Room, for "study or research," was 72,226—being about 6,000 less than in 1850 and 1851.

METHODIST BOOK OPERATIONS.

At a meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Conference, held in New York last week, among other reports was one on the Book Concern, which gives the total amount of assets at $706,733 05. Due on notes and book accounts, $29,858 56. The net amount of capital stock, Jan. 1, 1853, was $676,874 49. Amount of sales and receipts for periodicals for the past year, $252,648 57; ditto for 1851, $244,649 70; showing an increase in 1852 of $7,998 87. The whole amount of assets, after deducting 30 per cent. on notes and book accounts, is $613,812 36. Though the exhibit shows a considerable increase of sales, the Committee, in view of increased expenses and enhanced prices of labor, recommend that no dividend be made to the Conference the present year. The Christian Advocate and Journal has a circulation of 33,000, being a considerable increase. The Sunday-School Department continues to be in vigorous operation, and is accomplishing an important work. The number of volumes now constituting the libraries of this department has increased to nearly one thousand.

The Committee of the "Western Book Concern," at Cincinnati, reported the condition of that establishment to be prosperous. At Chicago they have established The Northwestern Christian Advocate, which has a circulation of about 3,600. The Ladies' Repository 12,281 subscribers, and The Christian Apologist 3,907. The subscription list of The Sunday-School Advocate is 23,525, which will probably increase to 30,000. The Missionary Advocate has 4,267 subscribers. The Committee are impressed with the vital importance of giving unremitting attention to the circulation of periodical literature, as well as the maintenance of a pure and elevated moral tone pervading that literature, and such as shall commend their periodicals to the general and hearty support of the people. The exhibit of accounts gives the total amount of resources at $242,802 69; Liabilities on notes and accounts, $16,530 90; Net capital, March 31, 1853, $226,271 78; Net capital, March 31, 1852, $316,203 53; Profits for year ending March 31, 1853, $10,068 25.

THE EASTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Eastern Association held its 17th Anniversary at New Market, N. J., on the fifth and sixth days of last week. The delegation in attendance was not as large as on some former occasions, but was sufficiently large to make an interesting meeting. The Central Association was represented by James R. Irish of De-Ruyter, and the Western Association by Thomas E. Babcock of Independence.

Eld. Charles M. Lewis, of Hopkinton, R. I., preached the introductory discourse, taking for his text Luke 6: 38—"Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give unto your bosom. For with the same measure that ye mete withal, it shall be measured to you again." The discourse was designed to illustrate and enforce the duty of contributing pecuniarily to sustain the enterprises of Christian benevolence, and the encouragements to the discharge of that duty.

After the usual opening exercises, the Association was organized, and A. B. Burdick was chosen Moderator, and G. B. Utter and E. P. Larkin, Secretaries.

Letters were received from all of the churches connected with the Association, except that at Newport, R. I. A letter was also received from the church in Petersburg, N. Y., requesting admission to the Association—a request which was granted. Of the general tone of these letters, something may be learned from the Report on the State of Religion, which will be found appended, and to which the reader is referred.

The Executive Committee of the Association presented a report of what had been done by them during the past year; from which it appeared, that Eld. Henry Clarke had supplied with preaching the Church at South Kingston, R. I., a part of the time during the year, and that S. S. Griswold had visited and preached at Block Island by direction of the Committee. The Church at South Kingston is represented as in an encouraging condition, and as now making an effort to build a house of worship, which is much need, and which the other churches are, by vote of the Association, requested to aid in erecting, by taking up each a contribution. A vote was also passed by the Association, recommending the Committee to continue to aid the South Kingston church.

At an early stage of the meeting, a Committee was appointed to consider and report what could be done, in addition to the regular business, to increase the interest of the annual sessions of the Association. This Committee recommended, among other things, the presentation of essays, by persons previously appointed for the purpose, upon such topics as would tend to stimulate investigation, and promote Christian activity. In accordance with this recommendation, Thomas B. Brown was appointed to prepare for the next session of the Association an essay on the best method of securing an able and efficient Ministry—treating especially upon the evidences of a divine call to the work. Joel Greene was appointed to prepare an essay on the nature, powers, and responsibilities of a Christian church.

Several topics brought to the attention of the Association by resolutions, led to remarks and discussions more or less interesting. We have not time to-day to specify each of these, and give a list of speakers, much less a sketch of their remarks. It must suffice to copy the resolutions, which will be found below, arranged nearly in the order of their introduction and discussion.

The Association adjourned near evening of Sixth-day, to meet again at Greenmanville, Ct., on the fifth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath in May, 1854; when the Introductory Discourse is to be preached by Joel Greene; W. B. Gillett alternate.

On Sabbath morning, a discourse was preached by Thomas E. Babcock, followed by the ordinance of the Lord's Supper. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon, Joel Greene preached.

On First-day morning, Wm. M. Jones preached a missionary discourse, followed by a collection in behalf of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society. In the afternoon, a discourse was listened to from James R. Irish.

Most of the time of First-day, not occupied by these meetings, was taken up with meetings of the Boards of the Missionary and Publishing Societies.

Resolutions.

Resolved, That in the removal of James H. Cochran, who departed this life in the month of February last, this Association has been deprived of one of its ablest ministers, of a most valuable counselor, and one of the brightest ornaments of the Christian Religion.

Resolved, That it is our duty to bow with humble submission to this afflictive dispensation of Providence, and to receive it as an admonition to greater diligence in the work of the Master, that, like our departed brother, we may be ready for the summons, when death shall call for us.

Resolved, That the sympathies of this body are cordially extended to the Plainfield Church in the bereavement it has sustained; and also to the afflicted widow and children, commending them to the love of Him whose compassions fail not.

Whereas, the Board of Managers of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society have in view the publication of a book of sermons, and brethern have been solicited to furnish materials for such a work—Resolved, That we approve of the proposed work, and would earnestly request those who have been applied to for the necessary manuscripts of sermons, to forward the same at their earliest convenience.

Resolved, That this Association commend to the favorable consideration of the Board of the Publishing Society the articles recently published in the Sabbath Recorder, under the title of "Mission of Youthful Sabbath-keepers," as appropriate for a Sabbath-school book, and we request them to take the necessary steps to secure its early publication.

Resolved, That we recommend to our Executive Board the enlargement of our missionary operations, in the establishment of new missions, as circumstances may direct.

Resolved, That we recommend to the several churches, in making returns to this body, to give the statistics of their Sabbath Schools, the names of their Superintendents, number of teachers and scholars, volumes in the libraries, and whatever may be of interest connected therewith.

Resolved, That Halsey H. Baker be requested to write an essay on the best practical method of conducting our Sabbath-schools, and report at our next meeting.

Resolved, That Joel Greene be appointed to write, and present at our next session, an essay discussing the propriety of our ministers' baptizing persons promiscuously on profession of faith in Christ, without reference to their becoming members of our churches immediately.

Resolved, That the churches composing this body be requested to report in their letters the several amounts contributed during the year for missionary purposes and for other benevolent objects.

Resolved, That our ministers, together with spiritually-minded lay members, should diligently seek out such men, particularly young men, as may bid fair to be useful in the gospel field, and that assistance should be rendered, when necessary, to prepare them for the work.

Resolved, That the education of the youth of our denomination should be a matter of unceasing solicitude to all the lovers of our Zion.

Resolved, That as far as possible we should seek to have them so educated in strictly Sabbath-keeping schools.

Report on the State of Religion.

The Committee on the State of Religion report—That through an examination of the communications from the churches, they find occasion for devout thankfulness, in the revival power which has graciously rested on two of the churches connected with the Association; for, whilst angels rejoice over one sinner that repenteth, we have occasion to rejoice in the hopeful conversion of many souls. But from most of the churches, a report is borne to our ears with saddening notes. To a few, additions have been made, and only a small share of these, except in one church, are reported as additions by baptism; and though there is some discrepancy in statistical enumerations, it is evident that there is in the aggregate a numerical decrease. Notwithstanding the sad notes, and a decrease in numbers, there seems a general attachment to the order and ordinances of the Lord's house, and an interest in the benevolent and reformatory institutions of the church, which may be regarded as a bow of promise. The two churches which reported revivals were those in Berlin and Plainfield—the former reporting twenty-eight, and the latter sixteen, additions.

Extracts from the letters might be expected in this report, but we forbear, as the substance of them may be gathered from what is already written. We however extract from the Plainfield letter, in order to record their acknowledgment of the mercies of God, and their sense of a great bereavement, which has caused them and us to mourn. They say:—

"We acknowledge that God hath dealt in mercy with us. Though we have been made to sorrow, it is not as those which have no hope. We feel that the past year has indeed been an eventful one in the history of this church. In December last, we held a series of evening meetings, and some precious souls were brought to a knowledge of the truth, and many were brought to inquire, 'What shall we do to be saved?' But scarcely had the work of grace commenced, before our beloved pastor, JAMES H. COCHRAN, was stricken down by disease, that terminated in death, and we are again left as sheep without a shepherd."

In view of the state of religion above depicted, we would earnestly inquire, Why is it thus? In relation to the bereavement, we would submissively say, "Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight." And for the mercy drops so graciously sent, we would look up with devout gratitude, and unhesitatingly ascribe glory to God for his unspeakable gift. But alas, what cause shall be assigned for the barrenness and dearth of others? Is it want of external conformity to gospel order, or an unwillingness to impart of our substance to the spread of truth? or is it not rather probable, that there is a want of that inward dedication of the soul to God, which seeks the humiliating, self-denying, cross-bearing labors of the gospel, and fills the heart with melting love to Christ, and is the spring of sweet fellowship between brethren, and an ardent desire for the conversion and sanctification of souls. Without presuming to judge our brethren, we would exhort to great searchings of heart, and to that devout watchfulness which is jealous with a godly jealousy over all the emotions of the soul, and which sees in all the changes of life repeated promptings to higher and higher attainments in the divine life.

THE WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

I wish to make a statement and an appeal through the Recorder to the Churches in the Western Association.

Statement.—By order of the Executive Board, on the third day of the present month, I sent to brother Rowse Babcock, our missionary in Darien, Clarence, and vicinity, thirteen dollars, in payment of an indebtedness upon our part for services rendered by brother Babcock in his present field of labor. The money so sent was stolen from the letter, by some one, doubtless, in the employ of the government. This money was sent at the risk of brother Babcock, as I understand it.

Appeal.—And now, dear brethren, although this money was sent at brother Babcock's risk, is it not our duty, considering the small sum owed him for his labor, and his absolute need of all that is his due, to unite and of ourselves make up this sum to him. A proposition to this effect has been made to the 1st Alfred Church, and I have no doubt it will be responded to. We propose, therefore, on the Sabbath previous to the sitting of the Association, to take a collection for this object. And, dear brethren, I appeal to you, in the name of our common Christianity, to assist in this matter, and so honor yourselves, and do good to a brother. N. V. HULL.

ALFRED CENTER, May 25, 1853.

CHURCH EXTENSION.—At the meeting of the New School Presbyterian General Assembly, held in Buffalo last week, the Committee on Church Extension reported in favor of raising $100,000 to loan in small sums to congregations for the purpose of erecting churches West. A general collection is to be taken up in all the churches on the second Sunday in November, to be renewed annually if deficient. The fund to be intrusted to a Committee of seven, residing in New York and Philadelphia. The Synod of Missouri has already raised $9,000 and Peoria $10,000 for the purpose, which will be made over. The report was adopted with enthusiasm.

ROBERT G. SHAW'S CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.—The Boston Transcript has been permitted by parties interested in the will of the late Hon. Robert G. Shaw, to make the following statement of legacies to public institutions, &c.:—

To the Boston Fatherless and Widow's Society	$3,000
The Widows' Society in Boston	3,000
Boston Children's Friend Society	3,000
Boston Seamen's Friend Society	3,000
Boston Marine Society	2,000
Society for Aged and Infirm Females	3,500
Howard Benevolent Society	1,500
Society for Aged and Destitute Clergymen	1,000
The Shaw Institute, or Asylum for Mariners' Children	110,000
Total	$130,000

A large picture in regard to the Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers, is given to the Pilgrim Society of Plymouth.

The preamble to the large bequest is in the following words:—

"In a commercial community like this, I deem it of great practical importance, that there should be a retreat or asylum provided for the succor and protection of the children of mariners in destitute circumstances, (whether orphans or otherwise,) under the age of ten years, and for the purpose of founding such a charity or hospital, to be called 'THE SHAW INSTITUTE, OR ASYLUM FOR MARINER'S CHILDREN."

Then follow the directions for the munificent bequest mentioned above. It will be seen that the total sum of the above donations to public institutions is one hundred and thirty thousand dollars.

PRIZE ESSAYS.—The London Peace Society and the Peace Congress Committee offer prizes as follows:—

"The sum of £250 ($1,250) will be paid to the author of the best essay upon the European standing armaments, to embrace the following points: A succinct history of the origin and growth of standing armaments in Modern Europe: An accurate statistical account of the present number of men employed by the European nations upon their Naval and Military Establishments, distinguishing between those in the regular forces, and those in semi-military services, such as Militia, National Guards, Landwehr, &c.: An estimate of the cost of these establishments, including the loss of the productive labor of the persons employed in them. The Essay should further discuss the moral, social, financial and political evils of this system of large peace establishments. They may be written in the English, French, or German language. The length not to exceed 200 pages of the Revue des Deux Mondes.

"A prize of £100 ($500) will be awarded to the second best Essay.

"His Excellency Chevalier Bunsen has consented to appoint the adjudicators. The essays to be placed in the hands of Mr. Henry Richard, Secretary of the Peace Congress Committee, 19 New Broad-st., Finsbury, London, on or before the 1st Jan. 1854.

"The copyright of the Essays to be property of the Peace Congress Committee."

The prizes come from a fund of $30,000 subscribed lately at Manchester, in part of the sum of $50,000, which is required to complete it. Samuel Gurney, Richard Cobden, John Bright, Milnor Gibson, John Angell James, and other prominent men, are the friends of the project.

NEW ENGLAND ANTI-SLAVERY CONVENTION.—The New England Anti-Slavery Convention met in Boston, Wednesday, May 25, 1853. Wendell Phillips was chosen President, with eight Vice-Presidents, including Charles Remond, colored, and Eliza Kenly, both of Salem. Henry C. Wright offered resolutions against voting or taking any part under the Constitution of the United States, doing so being an approval of all the acts of Government. Charles C. Burleigh supported the resolutions against allegiance to the Constitution, and opposed voting for officers of the United States. Mr. Garrison took the same ground, because he thought it was time men should act according to their consciences, and lend neither aid, sympathy or support to an instrument under which Slavery existed. Mr. Wright supported the resolutions. The Free-Soil party came in for a considerable amount of animadversion from the opponents of the Constitution.

NEW HOTEL.—Taylor's New Hotel and Restaurant, situated on the corner of Broadway and Franklin-st., is approaching completion. It is considered the largest and most elegant restaurant in the world, and when completed will have cost about $350,000, viz: the lot $120,000, the building and the furniture of the saloons and restaurant $180,000, and the furniture of the hotel part of the building about $50,000, It is 50 feet in width on Broadway; 125 feet in extent on Franklin-st; and 102 feet high from the cellar to the roof. The basement is a restaurant, the first floor is the saloon, and the five stories above the saloon are divided into rooms for hotel purposes. There are fifty parlors and one hundred and fifty bed-rooms in that part of the establishment. The hotel will be conducted on the European plan. From 125 to 150 persons will be regularly employed in the establishment, in various capacities.

HOW MRS. STOWE USES HER MONEY.—The Cleveland True Democrat, in a notice of Oberlin College, says:—

"The 'Edmundson girls,' whose history is so tragic, are receiving an education there. Mary, the elder of the two, is very sick, and fears are entertained that she will not recover. Emily's health is good, and she possesses the talent and energy that will make her a bright scholar. They were sent there by Mrs. Stowe, who pays for their schooling. Those who are not familiar with the lives of these young ladies, are requested to read the sixth chapter of the 'Key to Uncle Tom.' There is no more touching one in it."

SUNDAY TRAINS IN MASSACHUSETTS.—On the 23d of May, 1853, the House of Representatives of Massachusetts refused to instruct the State Directors of the Western Railroad to use their influence against the running of Sunday trains.

General Intelligence.

European News.

One week later advices from Europe have been received, which are comparatively unimportant.

Lord Campbell and five other Judges had pronounced a decision in the Writ of Error case of "Salomon versus Miller," to test the legality of Alderman Salomon, a Jew, voting in the House of Commons. Their decision confirmed the judgment of the lower Court—that Jews cannot sit in either House without taking the Christian oath.

In France, the reëstablishment of the Death Penalty for political crimes has been agreed upon by the Counsel of State.

Seven hundred emigrants from the Province of Ackvershans, were embarking at Christiana in the ships Argo, Tegner, and Zephyr—the two former for Quebec, and the latter for New York.

On the question of the Holy Shrines, all has been conceded that Russia had to demand. This is, however, rather a concession on the part of France than of Turkey. Some time since, the then French Ambassador, Lavalette, obtained from the Porte, by dint of considerable bluster, the grant to the Roman Catholics of certain privileges in the Holy Land, to which the Greek Church had until then claimed an exclusive right. The first demand of Prince Menchikoff was that this grant should be rescinded, and the two Churches put back essentially as they were before. The Porte had no direct interest in the question. Whether the Greeks or Latins occupy the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, is a matter of no moment to the Sultan. All that he desires and insists on is, that order should be preserved, and to that end it is necessary that there should be a clear understanding as to the rights of the two denominations. Strictly speaking, the dispute was between Russia as the defender of the Greeks, and France as the champion of the Latins. France has succumbed.

The Kaffir war was terminated by the complete submission of Sandilli and tribe, who have located beyond the Ker River. The treaty of peace was concluded by Gen. Cathcart on the 9th March.

From India we learn that the British, under General Cheape, had captured a stronghold of the robber chief Meaton, near Donabew, after 4 hours hard fighting. The loss to the British was 102 men. Nothing was known respecting the movements of the British force in Burmah.

The Emperor of China has asked assistance of the British.

Four Days Later.

The steamer Arctic, with London dates to May 18, arrived at New York on Sunday morning last.

Mrs. Stowe and her party had been present at a meeting of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society. She was received with a tumult of applause, the vast audience rising to welcome her, and the same enthusiastic ceremony was repeated as she went out. Professor Stowe made a speech on the occasion, counseling his hearers to abstain from slave-grown products.

From Australia, the gold news maintains its richness; one nugget has been found weighing above 134 lbs. of pure gold, and worth about $28,000.

In China, the rebellion was rapidly advancing, so that the inhabitants of Shanghae were in a panic. The interposition of the British, French, and American forces, has been begged by the Imperial Chinese authorities, and some men-of-war of each nation had gone from Hong-Kong northward, rather to protect their respective subjects and citizens, than to gratify the mandarins and uphold the tottering dynasty.

The month of March closed with a tremendous hurricane over the southern part of the Bay of Bengal, and south-western India. It commenced on the 26th, and swept across the country towards Ceylon, throwing off a branch to the westward. At Madras the ship Serampore, 73 tuns, Aboukir, 916 tuns, Lutchmi, 432 tuns, and the Portuguese brig Senhora del Monte, with five native brigs and 10 boats, were wrecked. At Pondicherry, five French vessels were stranded, and at Negapatam two went down at their anchors. Several vessels were lost off Ceylon, and a number of native boats were wrecked to the north of the Malabar coast. Traces of the gale were clearly discernible at Bombay, 460 miles at least from the nearest boundary of the region over which it prevailed in its violence, and rain and squalls occurred as far north as Deesa.

Singular Tragedy.

A dispatch dated Boston, Thursday, May 26, says, We have the particulars of a singular tragedy which occurred at the Insane Hospital at Somerville, yesterday noon, at about which hour a Mrs. Strong, of Vermont, an aged and very feeble person, was missing. The alarm was immediately given, and a search instituted for her in all directions. In the course of a few minutes she was found in the room of Mrs. Jameson, another lunatic, lying on the floor at the foot of the bed. Mrs. Jameson was kneeling on the bed, in the attitude of prayer, and looking directly down upon the body, which was covered by a sheet. There was apparent a slight bruise near the right temple, and another on the throat, but no indication of any struggle having occurred between the two women, and there was no discoloration of the face of Mrs. Strong, whose body, when found, retained much of the natural warmth of life, except that the feet were cold. Immediate and active restorative means were used, but without effect—she was dead.

Mrs. Jameson was asked how Mrs. Strong happened to be in her room, and what had taken place to occasion her death. Amid many evidences of entire delusion, she yet gave a natural and consistent account, which was repeated several times to this effect: "I heard Mrs. Strong asking for light—this was her constant habit—it occurred to me that the Lord had delivered her into my hands, and that if there was any more light in the other world, she should see it. She had been plaguing me, for many months, with this enquiry, and now, one of the attendants being gone out, and the other preparing dinner, I determined to be rid of the annoyance. I accordingly slipped out into the gallery, and invited Mrs. S. into my room. She came with me willingly; she had on two caps, I took them off and tied them round her neck, the strings broke. She stood still, close to me, making no resistance, so I knew the Lord had given her to me. I then put my hands around her throat and choked her. I then laid her down on the floor softly, so as to make no noise, and took off one of my stockings, and put it around her neck, pulling it as hard as I could—but it was no use—she was already dead. I felt her pulse, and I knew it. While I was doing this, I said my prayers, and thanked the Lord that he had permitted me to thus glorify his name."

The Trustees of the Institution are investigating the matter. The deceased, Mrs. Strong, and also Mrs. Jameson, are respectably connected, but for some time have been hopelessly insane.

SUMMARY.

On Sunday evening, the 1st of May, Wiley Hoffman, of Emanuel County, Georgia, was killed by his wife. Hoffman had been at some of the neighboring dramshops during the day, and had become very much intoxicated; he started for home, and arrived late in the evening; he took his gun and shot a dog lying in the yard, at which his wife made some remarks; he then turned to her, and commenced abusing and cursing her, swearing that he would kill her, and picked up his gun and attempted to shoot; she ran, and he after her; he threw the gun at her, then took up a stake some eight or nine feet long, pursued her, and coming up with her, knocked her down; after recovering enough to rise, he still thumping her, she drew a pistol, and shot him in the breast; he then drew his knife, she ran again, he after her, and continued the pursuit till he fell from exhaustion. He lived but a short time after he fell. Mrs. Hoffman gave herself up to the officers, and after an examination before James M. Tapley, a Justice of the Peace, was put under bonds for appearance at the Supreme Court of that County.

We learn from The Taunton Gazette, that Miss Nancy Sherman, of Plympton, who died May 15th, starved herself to death. She had been quite noted as a medium of spiritual communication, and by constant ministration in that office, had become so completely imbued with its hallucination as to be wholly unfitted for the ordinary duties of life. About a month since, she attempted to hang herself, but was prevented from accomplishing her design. She then announced that the spirits had forbidden her eating any more, and for three weeks she studiously abstained from partaking of any food, living on water alone, although at times so tortured by the pangs of hunger as to writhe in agony. The last week was passed in fearful alternations from convulsions to momentary consciousness, with constant relapses, until death finally put an end to her sufferings.

The Chicago Daily Tribune, of the 17th May, says that at noon the day previous there was a sudden and very evident change in the atmosphere, which brought an overcoat into immediate requisition. About the same time an extraordinary rise was observed in the Lake. There was no great amount of wind at the time, and the Lake was as calm as usual. It began, however, to swell and flow precisely like an ocean tide, each rise occupying fully fifteen or twenty minutes; then the Lake receded and rose again to a higher point than before, till the water was about three feet above the ordinary mark. Then followed, outside, a very heavy swell, and there was every appearance that the northern part of the Lake had been visited with a tremendous hurricane.

The Goldsboro (N. C.) Patriot, May 24, says: On Friday last, several negroes belonging to the estate of Fernifold Jernigan, deceased, were sold at the Court House. One negro, about 25 years of age, brought $1,040; another, somewhere between 30 and 40 years old, sold for $810. A woman, 28 years old, and child, were knocked down at $1,055. Three boys, 14, 12 and 10, brought $860, $800, and 700, respectively. These prices seem to indicate that negroes continue to be in demand at as high rates as have prevailed for some time. The bidding was spirited, and sales quick.

The New York Enonomist thinks that the production of gold is perhaps even in greater amount than the multiplication of paper. The Australian fields are known to have yielded, in thirty days to February 5th, 1853, 275,308 ounces—$5,506,160—and there arrived in New York from California in the same thirty days, $6,618,319. Thus the two sources supplied to commerce over $12,000,000 in a month, and succeeding months have not diminished the average, as far as California is concerned. The amount is near $15,000,000 per month actual receipts, or $180,000,000 per annum.

We have news from Mexico, down to May 9th. The Government was adopting severe measures against 'pernicious opinions,' had published a decree for the arrest of all guerillas in the late war, had degraded those officers who surrendered to Gen. Scott in the city of Mexico, and dispatched a corps to the Messilla Valley, to oppose its occupation by American troops. At Vera Cruz a sanguinary quarrel broke out on the 17th between the National Guards and the regular troops, which lasted three days, with a good deal of brisk firing. The disturbance was quelled by a body of regular troops from Jalapa.

We are at a loss, (says the Syracuse Central New Yorker, May 26,) what to advise our friends about wool, for the coming clip. It is the opinion of those who are the best informed on the subject, that wool will command a higher price early in the season, than it will three months from this time, and the more judicious and careful dealers are reluctant to buy, this season. Time must determine the correctness of this opinion. We quote wool as follows: Common grades, 35 cents; half and three-fourths blood, 40 cents; full-blood Merino, 50 cents, the average price of this country wool, 40 cents.

On Thursday afternoon, May 19, about 6 o'clock, as Mr. John Smith and four colored hands employed by Mr. R. Keeling, in hauling the seine on Lynnhaven beach, were attempting to enter the Inlet in a skiff, (the wind blowing a gale at the time,) by some accident the skiff missed her helm, and shipping two heavy seas in succession, immediately sunk, by which casualty Mr. Smith and two of the negroes were drowned—the other two succeeded in reaching the shore, but very much exhausted. The negroes drowned were John, the property of Mrs. Eliza Cox, and Frank, belonging to Mr. Wm. James, both of Princess Anne.

The wheat fields in this vicinity, (says the Grand Rapids, Mich. Eagle, May 21,) present the most favorable prospects for an abundant harvest; but the long continued rains have thus far put back the spring work to a considerable extent, especially upon low lands. If the rain continues much longer, a serious diminution in the supply of corn and oats next fall must be experienced; though, in a great measure, the loss will be made up by an abundant yield of grass, which no ordinary drouth can now prevent. The fruit prospect is fair; but not yet secure from frost.

The Indiana State Fair, 1853, is to be held at Lafayette, on the 11th, 12th, and 13th days of October. This point is accessible by canals and railroads. Among the premiums offered are six Silver Pitchers, valued at thirty-three dollars each; thirty-five Silver Cups, valued at fifteen dollars each; seventy-five Silver Cups, valued at ten dollars each; thirty sets of Tea-Spoons, valued at five dollars each; and a large number of premiums, consisting of Cash, Agricultural Works, Books, Diplomas, &c. The competition for the Silver Pitchers will be among the cultivators of wheat and corn and the owners of cattle, horses, jacks and hogs.

The Utica Observer of May 19 announces the complete organization of the Utica and Binghamton Railroad Company, and that too under the most favorable auspices. Among other prominent men, whose names we see announced as engaged in the enterprise, are ex-Lieutenant Governor John Tracy, Hon. Joseph Juliand, of Greene; John Butterfield, Utica; O. B. Matterson, Utica, and others equally wealthy and energetic. Under such auspices, there is little doubt but that the work will be put through with the least possible delay.

The report of the Bank Commissioners of Connecticut states that the aggregate capital of the fifty-five Banks in that State, including five organized under the general law of 1852, is $13,650,944 50, exceeding the previous year by nearly $1,500,000. The aggregate circulation is $11,217,630 06; specie on hand, $1,259,872 31; loans and discounts, $25,833,850 09. The circulation has increased over $3,000,000, from last year. The specie has increased over $400,000, and loans and discounts over $5,000,000 in the same time.

The names of the gentlemen who have secured the most important consulships under the new administration, were announced last week. They are as follows:—

Alex. M. Clayton, of Miss., Havana.
Nath'l Hawthorn, of Mass., Liverpool.
Thomas W. Ward, of Texas, Panama.
Benj. F. Angell, of N. Y., Honolulu.
Robert G. Scott, of Va., Rio Janeiro.
James M. Tarleton, of Ala., Melbourne.
Reuben Wood, of Ohio, Valparaiso.

The Xenia (O.) Torchlight mentions the recording in the books of the Probate Court of Greene Co. one of the longest wills, perhaps, on record in the United States. The will is that of the late Gen. James Taylor, of Newport, Ky. It covers 12½ pages of royal octavo, closely written. The fee for recording it amounted to $21 80. It relates to property valued at $4,000,000. As the testator was the owner of real estate in twenty-six counties of Ohio the will has to be recorded in each of them.

The Syracuse Journal gives an account of the first trip of the cars over the direct railroad from that city to Rochester. On returning, the train started from the depot an hour and ten minutes behind the regular mail train on the old road, and reached Syracuse forty minutes ahead of it. On the first of June regular trains are to be placed upon the new road, which is 24 miles shorter than the old one.

At South Boston, after a long search for a lost child the other evening, application was made to the teacher of the school where he attended, for such information as she might possess. She at first thought she had dismissed the boy as usual, but upon rubbing up her reflective powers a little, was enabled to remember that she had shut him in a closet, by way of punishment, and had forgotten to let him out.

The Directors of the New York Central Railroad will make a public opening of their new Straight Line Road from Syracuse to Rochester, on which occasion there will be an excursion from Albany to Niagara Falls, leaving Albany Saturday morning next at 6 o'clock, dining at Niagara Falls, staying over Sunday, and returning on Monday. The Legislature are invited, and the Press will be fully represented.

The Lackawana Herald says that the Delaware, Lehigh and Wyoming Railroad Company have issued the following order for the observance of those employed on the Road: "The use of Intoxicating Drinks of all kinds is strictly prohibited, and any person reported violating this Order, either on or off duty, accompanied with satisfactory proof of the fact, will be promptly discharged.

The Architects of the Crystal Palace have reported in writing to the Directors, that the building will be completed so as to be ready for the reception of goods by the middle of June, and the Directors thereupon feel confident that they will be enabled to open the Exhibition between the 1st and the 15th of July. The charge for admission is fixed at fifty cents.

It is understood that the stamped envelops will be issued by the Post-Office Department about the 1st of July. They will often be of great convenience to business men, as they can be immediately given to express-agents, baggage-masters, or any trustworthy person, without the loss of time which mailing, registering, &c., requires, preparatory to being sent away.

A small pleasure vessel, with a party on board, upset in the Patapsco River, Friday, May 27, and two females, named Mrs. McCartney and Miss Bridget Rundell, were drowned. A boy 12 years of age, son of J. F. Reese, jeweler, and William Weaver, died from exhaustion after they were rescued.

Her Majesty's war steamer Argus, Commander Purvis, has arrived at Halifax from Portsmouth, and will sail without delay to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, for the purpose of protecting the fisheries. She is to be followed by another steamer and several sailing vessels.

The Senate of Massachusetts rejected the Hoosac Tunnel bill by a vote of 18 yeas and 22 nays, and the House did the same to the resolve providing for the erection of the monument to Daniel Webster, by a vote of 111 yeas to 115 nays.

The steamer Baltic, Capt. Comstock, left at noon on Saturday last for Liverpool, with 229 passengers, being the largest number any steamer for Europe ever carried away from this port, excepting the Pacific during the World's Fair at London, when she took away 238. Among the Baltic's passengers is Dr. Bailey, Editor of the National Era, Washington.

A suit is about to be commenced by the Michigan Southern and Indiana Northern Railroad against the Illinois Central Railroad, to restrain the Illinois Central from running their cars across the track of the Southern road. So the dispute about the rights of the different companies is to be settled by the highest legal tribunals of the country.

A stringent law against gambling has just passed the Senate of Maryland by a vote of 16 to 1. The bill had previously passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 40 to 9. It goes into effect on the 1st day of July next, and is similar in its provisions to the laws now in force in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Kentucky.

Advices received at the Department of State, report that Mr. Rives, the American Minister at Paris, had been informed by the Emperor that the Universal Exhibition in Paris would be held on the 1st of May, 1855, and that all nations were cordially invited to participate in the exhibition.

William N. Berry, connected with a disreputable paper called Life in Boston, was assaulted by some unknown individual, May 9, when he discharged one barrel of a revolver at his assailant, who thereupon fled. Later in the night, the office of Life in Boston was entered, and most of the type thrown out of the window.

The editor of the Catholic Mirror says he has received authentic information, that Patrick O'Donohue, and another one of the Irish exiles, had escaped from Van Dieman's Land, and will shortly arrive at one of our Atlantic ports. Their manner of escape is not known, but it is probable they got on board of some American ship trading to Australia.

We understand that, on Saturday last, a little girl was run over and killed on the Housatonic Railroad, about two miles south of Gaylord's Bridge in New Milford, Ct. She was cut in two—her head being severed from the body as completely as if it had been done with an axe. She was about 10 years of age.

Some of the Canada papers contain an offer of $250 reward for the apprehension of William E. Brainerd, who murdered Mrs. Nancy Brainerd, his mother, and shot his brother, on the 16th of April last, near Melbourne, Canada East, in a fit of insanity, and made his escape. He is 35 years of age.

A dispatch dated Baltimore, May 29, says: The Oregon Iron Furnace, in Baltimore County, twenty miles from this city, was destroyed by fire this morning, together with all the out-buildings and machinery. Loss not less than $50,000.

The clipper-ship Northern Light, which left San Francisco on the 13th of March, arrived at Boston, May 29, having made the passage from port to port in 76 days. The Northern Light left Boston just seven months ago on her outward passage to San Francisco.

A bill has been reported in the Massachusetts House of Representatives to incorporate the Bank of Mutual Redemption. The stock is to be subscribed by the various banks in Massachusetts, and it will take the place measurably of the Suffolk Bank. The capital stock is limited to $3,000,000.

A new city, called "Crescent City," has recently sprung up on the Pacific coast, about two hundred miles north of San Francisco. Crescent City is expected to become the entreport for the extreme northern mines. It is being rapidly settled up.

The Georgia, from Aspinwall, had $1,130,737 in gold on her manifest. The other three steamers, the Union, Uncle Sam, and Crescent City, had probably, on freight and in the hands of passengers, about three-quarters of a million.

The Chicago Daily Tribune says that a Catholic Cathedral is to be commenced some time during the season, on the north side, near the Catholic college in that city. It will probably be the largest and finest in that part of the country, and cost between $150,000 and $200,000.

All attempts to repeal the Maine Law of Massachusetts, by the Legislature just adjourned, failed by decisive majorities, while attempts to amend and render it more stringent and effective failed in the House by a tie vote, and in the Senate by one majority.

S. V. R. Mallory, while walking on the track of the railroad at Canandaigua, was caught by the cow-catcher, and thrown down a bank, and considerably injured. He was taken up in a state of insensibility, but is likely to recover.

The steamship Cincinnati, from New Orleans, in attempting to cross Brazos bar, on the 23d ult., was driven among the breakers, her engine disabled, and she would prove a total loss.

It is reported that on the 19th ult., Hon. Wm. Marvin, Judge of the U. S. Court at Key West, was burnt in public effigy amid much excitement, but the particular reason is not stated.

Joseph K. Groves has been tried at Clinton, N. C., on a charge of kidnapping, found guilty, and sentenced to be hung on the first Friday of July. An appeal, however, has been taken to the Supreme Court of the State.

Mr. Worrall, of Newburgh, has raised a pair of fine cattle, which have been sold to parties in this City for $2,700. They are to be exhibited at the World's Fair, together with nine head from the farm of Henry Clay.

Mr. Bennett, the Editor of The Herald, is at Weisbaden, trying the effects of the baths upon the bronchitis, a complaint with which he is considerably troubled.

Messrs. Rafferty & Leask, hatters, of No. 57 Chatham-st., are now putting a daguerreotype likeness of each of their customers into his hat, free of charge. This is a new notion, indeed.

Thomas Johnson, convicted at New Orleans of robbing the mail on board the steamship Mexico, has been sentenced to ten years in the penitentiary.

A serious flare-up has occurred between Peru and Bolivia, in consequence of a dispute of some months' standing.

The subject of City Railroads for Jersey City, is engaging some attention, and we understand that a project of the kind is forming with a view of establishing this facility from the ferry towards Bergen Point.

The census of Nashua, N. H., just taken, shows a population of 5,891, viz.: 2,526 males, and 3,365 females—an increase of 514 since last year.

A Self-Rocking Cradle (wound up and running twenty-four hours on the clock or pendulum principle) has been invented by a Yankee named Edwards.

MARRIED,

In Hopkinton, R. I., on the 22d of May, by Eld. C. M. Lewis, Mr. CHARLES H CHIPMAN to Miss FRANCES A. SAUNDERS, all of Hopkinton.

In Hopkinton, R. I., May 22, by Eld. D. Coon, Mr. ISRAEL GATES, of Voluntown, to Miss PHEBE M. BROWN, of Hopkinton.

In Hopkinton, R. I., April 2, 1853, by Eld. H. Clarke, Mr. THOS. M. WILCOX, of Greenmanville, Ct., to Miss SARAH A. KENYON, of Hopkinton.

On the 9th of May, by Eld. Elias Burdick, SAMUEL A. CHILDS to LUCELIA O. WHITING, both of Scott, Cortland Co., N. Y.

In Little Genesee, N. Y., on Sabbath evening, May 21st, by Samuel Wells, Esq., Mr. NELSON ROSE, of Rushford, to Miss CAROLINE DWINNELL, of Yorkshire.

DIED,

In Westerly, R. I., on the 22d of May, after a short illness, Mr. SILAS MAXSON, in the 71st year of his age, lamented by a large connection. Bro. Maxson gave his heart to the Saviour in early life, and had never taken it back. He became a member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton more than 60 years ago, where he remained a humble follower of the blessed Jesus, walking in all his commandments and ordinences blameless, until he was called to join the church above. In his death, the family experience an irreparable loss, his connexions the loss of a warm and true friend, the church an advocate and supporter, and the missionary cause one of its liberal helpers. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints.

D. C.

In North Stonington, Ct., on the 21st of May, Mr. JOSEPH R. ALLEN, in the 44th year of his age. He professed religion some twenty years since, and united with the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I., of which he remained a member until his death. He has left good evidence that he has "fallen asleep in Christ."

In Plainfield, Otsego Co., N. Y., May 24th, Mr. JABEZ DEWEY, in the seventy-first year of his age. Mr. D. had been afflicted with calculus, and his death was more immediately the result of a surgical operation. He was a man much esteemed as a Christian and a philanthropist, and his religion had interwoven in it that most excellent grace of visiting and relieving the wants of such destitute widows and orphans as came within his knowledge. He bore his sufferings with Christian patience, and, we trust, has gone to receive a gracious reward. He has left a widow, several children, and many relatives and friends, to lament their loss.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of TITSWORTHS & DUNN, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

The Illustrated Weekly Record

OF THE NEW YORK EXHIBITION OF THE INDUSTRY OF ALL NATIONS, under the direction of Prof. B. SILLIMAN, Jr., aided by eminent writers in each Department of Science and Art.

This Journal, as its name implies, will record the history, progress, and results of the New York Industrial Exhibition.

The Literary portion of the paper will be prepared under competent editorial supervision, by the ablest literary, scientific, and practical men, and will include essays, descriptions, and criticisms, in the following Departments:—
I. NATURAL SCIENCE—Raw Materials, &c.
II. MACHINERY.
III. MANUFACTURES—in Subdivisions.
IV. FINE ARTS.

General Essays may be expected on the condition and results of the several Departments, on the natural resources of our country, and on the methods by which they may be made most available to American Art, and to artistic and industrial Manufactures. Other articles of a more general scope, on topics naturally suggested by the Exhibition, will be occasionally admitted. It is intended that all the descriptions and criticisms shall be accurate, and strictly impartial and independent. The Essays will be as free as possible from mere technicalities, and every effort will be made to render them attractive and interesting to general readers.

The Letter-Press will be illustrated by Engravings of the most beautiful, interesting, and suggestive of the various objects exhibited, including, as far as possible, all such as may gratify and instruct. THE RECORD will thus supply sources of instruction to Artisans and Manufacturers of every class, and render the Exhibition permanently and practically useful, long after the contents have been dispersed.

THE ILLUSTRATED RECORD will be issued weekly from the opening to the close of the Exhibition, and will be completed in twenty-six numbers, besides a probable Supplement.

Each number will consist of four double-columned pages of letter-press, four pages of Illustrations, and four pages devoted to the circulars of Exhibitors. The first number will contain four extra pages, including Architectural details of the Building, and the designs by Sir Jos. Paxton and the late A. J. Downing, and will be published on the day of the opening of the Exhibition.

"Office of the Association for the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations,
NEW YORK, 21st Jan., 1853.

"MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM & CO.—Gentlemen: The proposals made by you, in conformity with the advertisement, issued from this office on the 22d November, having been accepted, and a contract made thereupon, you have become exclusively entitled to the privilege of publishing, under the authority and sanction of this Association, an Illustrated Catalogue and Illustrated Newspaper relating to the Exhibition, now in course of preparation, and of printing and selling the same in the Exhibition Building. You have also become contractors for the publication of the Hand Catalogue. For the compilation, publication, and sale of these works you will receive all the facilities that the Board of Directors can reasonably afford you.

"You are well aware that the object of the Association, in making an arrangement of this kind, is not pecuniary gain, but to secure a publication of a superior grade of typographical, literary, and artistic merit. To this you have assented; and if the very high standard agreed on be reached by you, the result will, it is hoped, be of great and lasting beneficial influence.

"I am, very respectfully, gentlemen,
"Your obedient servant,
"W. WHETTEN, Secretary."

TERMS—For the 26 Nos. and Supplement, post-paid $3, in advance.

A handsome Cover for the Volume will be furnished to subscribers. Price 50 cents.

Good Night.

"Good night!" a word so often said,
The heedless mind forgets its meaning;
'T is only when some heart lies dead
On which our own was leaning,
We hear in maddening music roll
That last "good night" along the soul.

"Good night!" in tones that never die.
It peals along the quickening ear;
And tender gates of memory
Forever waft it near,
When stilled the voice—oh, crush of pain!—
That ne'er shall breathe "good night" again.

"Good night!" it mocks us from the grave;
It overleaps that strange world's bound
From whence there flows no backward wave
It calls from out the ground,
On every side, around, above,
"Good night, good night," to life and love!

"Good night!" Oh, wherefore fades away
The light that lived in that dear word?
Why follows that "good night" no day?
Why are our souls so stirred?
Oh, rather say, dull brain, once more,
"Good night!" thy time of toil is o'er.

"Good night!" Now cometh gentle sleep
And tears that fall like welcome rain.
"Good night!"—oh, holy, blest, and deep,
The rest that follows pain.
How should we reach God's upper light
If life's long day hath no "good night?"

Railroad Accidents in Great Britain.

The following abstract of the semi-annual returns of railway accidents in Great Britain has a peculiar interest, just now, to American readers:—

"From the returns made to the Railway Department of the Board of Trade, it appears that the total number of persons of every description killed and injured on all the passenger railways open for traffic in Great Britain and Ireland, during the half year ending the 31st December, 1852, amounted to 133 killed, and 387 injured, and are classed as follows: Nine passengers killed from causes beyond their own control; 12 passengers killed and three injured, owing to their own misconduct or want of caution; 31 servants of companies or of contractors killed and 42 injured, from causes beyond their own control; 40 servants of companies or of contractors killed and 17 injured, owing to their own misconduct or want of caution; and 41 trespassers and other persons, neither passengers nor servants of the company, killed, and 9 injured by crossing or walking on the railway. The number of persons conveyed during the half year amounted to 49,886,124. The length of railway open on the 30th June, 1852, was 7,076 miles, and on the 31st December, 1852, 7,345 miles, showing an increase of 260 miles. During the year 1852 the additional length of new line opened for traffic was 446 miles; the number of persons killed was 216, and injured 486. The number of passengers conveyed during the year was 89,135,729."

The number of passengers killed from causes beyond their own control was 10, being on an average one person killed for every 8,913,572 passengers conveyed; the number of passengers killed owing to their own misconduct or want of caution was 22, being at the rate of one passenger for every 4,051,624 passengers conveyed. The number of passengers killed and injured on railways during the year 1852, from causes beyond their own control, was 382, or one for every 233,339 passengers conveyed; and the number of passengers killed and injured owing to their own misconduct or want of caution was 30, or one for every 2,871,191 passengers. The number of servants of companies or of contractors killed during the year was 120, or one for every 61 miles of railway open for traffic; and the number of injured was at the rate of one for every 98 miles of railway. Of the 120 servants killed, 57 were killed from causes beyond their own control, and 63 from want of caution. The number of trespassers killed was 64, and injured 17. Total, 81, or one for every 90½ miles of railway open for traffic in the United Kingdom.

A Church Struck by Lightning.

From the Lockport Courier of May 23.

We are called upon to record an awful and solemn visitation of Providence; one that has thrown a gloom over the entire community. Yesterday afternoon, just after the commencement of service at the Congregational Church, the house was struck by lightning, causing the death of Mr. Luther Crocker, Jr., and injuring more or less Samuel Durfee, Cyrus C. Northam, a lad about 14 years of age, son of Wm. Mack; Mary Place, daughter of George Place; Frances Holmes, daughter of Alfred Holmes; and Miss Sarah Stewart.

The lightning struck the church steeple on the south-west corner, passing down into the gallery occupied by the singers, which was directly under the steeple, and all the persons affected by the shock were members of the choir. They were about concluding the introductory hymn when the shock came, carrying death, sorrow and dismay into their midst. The main streak of electricity entered the gallery directly over the head of Mr. Crocker, who was playing the bass viol, and diverged off either way, injuring the persons named above.

The first moment after the shock was one of universal consternation and dismay. Every person in the gallery, numbering some twelve or fifteen, except one or two, were prostrated by the shock, but those who escaped injury, aided by persons from below, immediately proceeded to the assistance of the unfortunate. Some of the injured persons had their faces and bodies badly burned, making them present a horrible picture.

They were all removed as quick as possible to the open air, and the proper remedies were applied, under the direction of Drs. Fassett and Gould—who providentilly were in the church at the time—which were successful in restoring to consciousness all except Mr. Crocker. The deceased, to all outward appearances, sustained the least injury of any of the sufferers, but he was doubtless visited with the heaviest shock.

The lightning seems to have passed along the outside of his vest, down to the right thigh, then across, down his left leg, ripping open his boot in passing off. The only scar on his person is on the left foot, and this is very slight. He spoke once after the shock.

Mr. Elias Clark was standing between him and Mr. Durfee, and not being injured, he proceeded to lift the latter up, when the deceased said to him, "Help me, I am hurt the worst!" Mr. C. was immediately taken out, but he only gasped once or twice and expired. His body was then taken to the office of Dr. Fassett, and every means which medical science could suggest was used in vain to restore him to consciousness.

The scene within the church immediately after the shock is represented by an eye-witness to have been awful in the extreme. The pastor, Rev. Mr. Gillman, whose position in the pulpit was such as to enable him to see at a glance the terrible effect of the lightning, fainted away, as did several of the ladies, and a ghastly paleness overspread every countenance.

The shock was so terrible, and its effects so astounding, that it seemed to deprive all of the power of giving vent to their feelings in the manner usully exhibited on similar but less appalling occasions. Not a shriek or a groan was heard, save the almost inaudible ones made by some one of the victims, no bustle or confusion ensued, but dread consternation seemed to take hold of all for the time.

As the bodies were removed out in front of the church, a crowd gathered, and as the dread intelligence spread hundreds came to offer their sympathy. There has never been an occurrence in our midst which has seemed to spread such universal gloom and sadness.

The lightning was seen to strike the church by several persons outside, those near by being stunned by its effects. A piece of the cornice of the steeple was thrown across the road on the east of the church, and several long slits from the wood work lodged in the middle of the road on the south.

The lightning seems to have gone in and out of the building several times before reaching the ground, and it appears to have finally divided, one portion of it reaching the ground by the portico, and the other by passing from the gallery to the basement.

The course of the electricity in the house was very singular; it appears to have gone from object to object in an unusual manner, and some persons think it to have divided into numerous parts, but this is all conjecture. The gallery is much shattered from its effects, but no damage is done to the wall or timbers of the church.

Take Care of Your Health.

To a young man who asked of Horace Mann counsel to guide him towards success in the legal profession he replied, tersely, promptly, and definitely. He opens with the following very common sense and important suggestions touching the necessity of health:

"First, you need health. An earnest student is prone to ruin his health. Hope cheats him with the belief that, if he can study now without cessation, he can do so always. Because he does not see the end of his strength, he foolishly concludes there is no end. A spendthrift of health is one of the most reprehensible ofspendthrifts. I am certain I could have performed twice the labor, both better and with greater ease to myself, had I known as much of the laws of health and life, at twenty-one, as I do now. In college, I was taught all about the motions of the planets, as carefully as though they would have been in danger of getting off the track if I had not known how to trace their orbits; but about my own organization, and the conditions indispensable to the healthful functions of my own body, I was left in profound ignorance. Nothing could be more preposterous. I ought to have begun at home, and taken the stars when it should have come their turn. The consequence was, I broke down at the beginning of my second college year, and have never had a well day since. Whatever labor I have been since able to do, I have done it all on credit, instead of capital—a most ruinous way, either in regard to health or money. For the last twenty-five years, so far as it regards health, I have been put, from day to day, on my good behavior; and during the whole of this period, as a Hibernian would say, if I had lived as folks do for a month, I should have died in a fortnight.

"Health has a great deal to do with what the world calls talent. Take a lawyer's life through, and high health is at least equal to fifty per cent. more than brain. Endurance, cheerfulness, wit, eloquence, attain a force and splendor with health which they never can approach without it. It often happens that the credit awarded to the intellect belongs to the digestion. Though I do not belive that genius and eupepsy are convertible terms, yet the former can never rise to its loftiest heights unaided by the latter.

"Again; a wise man, with a great enterprise before him, first looks round for suitable instruments wherewith to execute it; and he thinks it all-important to command these instruments before he begins his labor. Health is an indispensable instrument for the best qualities and the highest finish of all work. Think of the immense advantage you would have in a suit in court, if, after a week's or a fortnight's investigation of facts, you could come in for the closing argument on the last day, fresh and elastic, with only so much more of momentum and fervor for the velocity and the glow you had acquired!"

How it Strikes a Foreigner.

The following eloquent remarks of the Rev. M. Pilatte, during his his visit to this country, are still remembered by many of the friends of the benevolent institutions which he addressed. While here he did not fail to form a correct estimate of the cause of our national felicity, as his remarks at the last anniversary of the French and Foreign Bible Society sufficiently prove:—

"Nothing," said he, "is more admirable than the peace, the prosperity, the liberty which the United States of America enjoy. But let any one ask the people of that country, whatever may be their religious or political opinions, and they will agree to ascribe their temporal blessings to the influence of the Sacred Book. The Pilgrims of New England, the fathers of the American nation, took that book for their supreme law on their arrival in the solitudes of the New World, and they bequeathed to their posterity, with profound respect for the Scriptures, that spirit of order, and that respect for law which are the surest guaranty of peace and liberty. The stranger who visits the United States is astonished to see scarcely any military force; and he can with difficulty conceive (as is the case) that even in the capitol, at Washington, at the time when Congress holds its sessions, where the President occupies the White House, that there is in that great city, where the destinies of a vast continent are decided, not a soldier, not a sentinel, not a weapon visible. The secret of that wonder is in the religious spirit which secures respect for the laws, both inspired by the teachings and influence of the Bible. Thus it is not surprising that American Christians, grateful to God for what the Bible has done for them, should be zealous to spread it abroad. Above all, they are interested in its diffusion in France. They remember the aid which they received during the trying period of the War of Independence, and it is to repay in a manner all pacific and Christian, that debt of gratitude, that they now aid so generously in circulating the Bible among our citizens.

The Hive and Honey Bee.

In advance of publication, we have been permitted to look at the sheets of a forthcoming work on the above subject, by the Rev. L. L. Langstroth, of Greenfield, Mass. We have read them with pleasure, and believing in their statements, as we do, from our own observation of the habits of the bee, we may add, with gratification and delight. The descriptions are clear and concise, and are strengthened by quotations from the ablest writers on the subject, We give below a single extract now, and shall refer to the subject again.

"Many persons have not the slightest idea that every thing may be seen that takes place in a bee-hive. But hives have for many years been in use, containing only one large comb, inclosed on both sides by glass. These hives are darkened by shutters, and when opened, the queen is exposed to observation as well as the other bees. Within the last two years, I have discovered that with proper precautions, colonies can be made to work in observing hives, without shutters, and exposed continually to the full light of day; so that observations may pe made at all times, without in the least interrupting the ordinary operations of the bees. By the aid of such hives, some of the most intelligent citizens of Philadelphia have seen in my Apiary, the queen bee depositing her eggs in the cells, and constantly surrounded by an affectionate circle of her devoted children. They have also witnessed, with astonishment and delight, all the steps in the mysterious process of raising queens from eggs, which, with the ordinary development, would have produced only the common bees. For more than three months, there was not a day in which some of my colonies were not engaged in making new queens to supply the place of those taken from them, and I had the pleasure of exhibiting all the facts to bee-keepers who never before felt willing to credit them. As all my hives are so made that each comb may be taken out and examined at pleasure, those who use them, can obtain from them all the information which they need, and are no longer forced to take anything upon trust.

From Pettengill's Reporter.

Stick to It.

The very doctrine of all others. "Stick to it." Who ever knew a mortal to enrol himself under this banner, and come out at the little end of the horn? Nobody, we'll be bound. Its principle, acted up to with rectitude, purpose, heart and soul, would keep any man above water and in blue sky.

"Stick to it." It's the very history of success in epitome. All history, all experience; the triumph of mind, art, literature, every great and noble work is its direct and appropriate illustration. He who would be, do, gain, make, save, achieve anything in whatever department of life, trade, politics, religion, philanthropy, or love, must make it his first and last object of solicitude—the Alpha and Omega of his aspiration and action.

Tell us, young man, whoever did a thing worth a note, that did not "stick to it?" Look around you among your acquaintances, and see who is, and who is not, "something." In him who is deservedly famous and honored, you will find the man who, years ago in the strength, determination, energy, and light of an all-conquering resolution said, "I'll stick to it," and who did, and has stuck to it ever since.

What has made great lawyers, statesmen, divines, artists? What has made a Webster, a Choate, a Brougham, a Kossuth? Simply, and solely, and truly, by choosing something real and vital, and "sticking to it." And if you wish, or expect, or mean to do or be anything, you have got to do likewise. Then choose, and "stick to it." Armed with its principle and inspiration, you may rise to undreamed of heights—wanting it, you may sink to unthought of depths.

The Middlesex Company make use annually of 6,000,000 Teasels, 2,000,000 lbs. fine Wool, 50,000 lbs. Glue, $30,000 worth Dye Stuffs, and $13,000 worth of Soap.

In addition to the above, the Merrimack Manufacturing Co. use 1,000,000 lbs. of Madder, 380,000 lbs. of Copperas, 60,000 lbs. of Alum, 50,000 lbs. of Sumac, 40,000 lbs. of Soap, 45,000 lbs. of Indigo, per annum.

The Lowell Bleachery use 40,000 lbs. of Indigo, and $25,000 worth of dyeing materials per year.

Other manufactures are produced in the city than those specified above, of a value of $1,500,000, employing a capital of $400,000, and about 1,500 hands.

The population of Lowell in 1828 was 3,532; in 1840 it was 20,796; in 1850 it was 33,385. Increase in ten years, 12,580.

The Lowell Machine Shop, included among the above Mills, can furnish Machinery complete for a Mill of 6,000 Spindles, in three months, and a Mill can be built in the same time.

The several Manufacturing Companies have established a Hospital for the convenience and comfort of persons employed by them respectively when sick, which is under the superintendence of one of the best of surgeons and physicians.

There are two Institutions for Savings, the Lowell and the City. The Lowell had on deposit the first Saturday in Nov., 1850, from 4,609 depositors $736,128 12. The City, Jan. 8, 1853, had on deposit, from 2,374 depositors, $192,006 01. The operatives in the mills are the principal depositors in the above Banks.

A Reservoir of great capacity has been built on the high ground in Belvidere, east of the city, for the purpose of furnishing a ready supply of water to any part of the city in cases of fire. The water is conveyed into the Reservoir by means of force-pumps from the Lowell Machine Shop. Pipes are laid from the Reservoir to various parts of the city, at which points a hose can be attached to the hydrants without delay, when necessary.

Estimated population of Lowell in 1853, 37,000.

The Belgian Law of Divorce.

Some few years since, a young Belgian lady, fresh from her convent education, appeared in society, captivated a young fellow countryman with well oiled hair and patent-leather boots, and after an acquaintance of a few weeks married him. The happy pair sojourned, as is often the custom abroad, with the father and mother of the lady. The young wife was a gay lady, and her husband was quite as gay a lord. At every ball and party in the capital they were present; and, as married ladies are especially selected by continental gentlemen for what they call "adoration," the young wife, although she got no more of it than she liked, was honored with considerably more than pleased her husband. The latter remonstrated—the lady rebelled—and "my wife's mother," ut solent matronæ, supported her daughter. The husband settled the matter by putting on his hat and retiring to his own paternal mansion. The marital feud was now intense, and the conjugal couple were only of the same mind touching one single subject—application to the tribunals for a divorce. This was done; but the Belgian law will allow of no such annulling of a marriage contract until the angry parties have renewed their demand for a divorce once every year for three years. Our young couple nourished their wrath during this triennial period of probation—thrice made the demand—and were duly summoned last year to hear consent given that they who had been one should thenceforth, and forever, remain two. From different sides of the Court the married pair witnessed the untying of the knot; and, when they were free, they passed out at the common portal into the public street. Approximation fired friendship, and the gentleman offered his hand to the lady in token that there was no malice between them. Friendship had no sooner lit his torch than he illuminated the slumbering cinders on the chilled altar of love; and the young couple walked together to their first married home, whence the husband has never since permanently withdrawn.

Farm Engineering.

This is a branch of education that is almost entirely neglected in the United States, and yet in no country is the daily practice of it more required. There is not one farmer in a thousand who understands the principles of properly conducting water from a distant source to his house or barn-yard; still fewer who know any thing of digging ditches, forming drains, laying pipe, &c.; and scarce any at all who can take levels and calculate areas with exactness.

Scarce a day passes that we are not called upon for advice in these matters, particularly by gentlemen who are leaving the city to pass a few months of their time at their country places, which they are very desirous of judiciously improving and embellishing; and yet we are only able to give the required information in a general theoretical way, which answers but an imperfect purpose, because it is necessary to be on the spot when the improvements are to be carried out, and make a minute personal inspection, and then oversee the work as it goes on.

Now it strikes us that if a few persons would qualify themselves theoretically and practically as farm engineers, they would find abundant employment at good wages, particularly in the neighborhood of large towns; and if in addition they were good practical farmers and gardeners, and had some knowledge of chemistry, geology, botany, arboriculture, and the science of breeding and improving domestic animals, it would be all the better for them and the country.

Some things are now taught at the public schools which are of but little use to the rural population; but if Farm Engineering could take their place it would be found of great service to the farmers individually, and add much to their latent resources and the value of their land. Will the directors of our Common Schools take this subject into consideration, and endeavor to put it in execution?

MAINE MOOSE.—Maine is determined that her moose shall not be annihilated. The new law is to this effect: No person, not a resident of Maine, is permitted to hunt or kill any moose or deer within the limits of that State, except upon his own land, under a penalty of forty dollars for each deer so killed; and any person is allowed to shoot any dogs found hunting moose or deer under the direction of persons prohibited by this law. A moose warden is to be appointed by the Governor for each of the northern and eastern counties, who have power to appoint deputies, and whose duty it will be to enforce the act. Any person having in his possession the carcass or hide of a moose between the 15th day of April and the 1st of October, or the carcass or hide of a deer between the 15th day of January and the 1st of September, will be liable to the same penalties, if unable to show proof that it was obtained in a lawful manner.

Between thirty and forty barrels of liquor were lately seized in Augusta, Me., where they had been freighted by the schooner Rochester from Boston. There were no directions on the casks, and nothing to indicate their owner. The liquor, amounting in all to 1,345 gallons, will be advertised under the provisions of the law, and disposod of as contraband, unless the owner appears, and proves the contrary. Another lot, contained in one barrel, three kegs, two demijohns, and two bottles, was seized at an establishement on State-st., kept by Greenleaf Brown. The keeper was prosecuted for alledged sale, convicted and fined according to law, and the liquor ordered to be destroyed.

EJECTING COLORED PERSONS.—The case of ejectment, in which Sarah P. Remond, (colored,) of Salem, brought a complaint against Henry Palmer, an agent of Madam Sontag, and Officer Philbrick, for assault at the Howard Atheneum, the same consisting of a pressure against the complainant's person sufficient to cause her ejectment from the theater, was brought to a close, Wednesday afternoon, in the Police Court. Judge Russell rendered a formal and elaborate opinion on the question. The two points decided, and which cover the whole ground, were—first, that the parties had had a right to enter and take seats in the house; second, that the agent and officer had no right to eject them. The Judge held that colored persons could not be excluded from public performance, for which they had purchased tickets, unless ample notice had been given to the parties that such could not be admitted. In this case no such notice had been given. Palmer was fined $1 and costs, and Phillbrick $1 without costs. An appeal was entered, and the case will go to the upper Court. [Boston Bee.

THE LIABILITY OF RAILROADS.—A case of considerable interest to the public and Railroad Companies has just been decided in the U. S. Circuit Court at Chicago. The parties were John Kuter, a Pennsylvania Dutchman, as plaintiff, and the Michigan Central Railroad, as defendant, and two days were occupied in hearing evidence and arguments of counsel. It appeared that the plaintiff, coming to Illinois to reside, among various other things, plac ed in a large dry-goods box some seventeen hundred dollars in gold, which, on his route, he placed in the care of the defendants at Detroit, in April of last year, to be transported to Chicago, and that the box and money were lost. This suit was for the recovery of the same, or compensation for its loss. The case was submitted to the Jury, who, under the instruction of Judge Drummond, after being out for a short time, returned a verdict for the plaintiff of nineteen hundred and ninety-four dollars and sixty nine cents, that being the full amount claimed by the plaintiff for the goods and the gold the box contained, with interest from the time of the loss to the present.

BEES AND BEE MOTHS.—Speaking of bees, The Mobile Tribune says: "Such of our readers as are engaged in the bee culture will be glad to learn that a remedy has been discovered which effectually prevents the ravages of the bee moth. The frequent and serious injury caused by this pestiferous insect, has deterred many persons from entering into the business of raising bees, more especially as in some localities the ravages have been so great as nearly to destroy both bees and honey. The plan is this: split joints of cane through the center and arrange them on four sides of the hive, with the split side resting on the platform. The moth, instead of depositing its eggs under the edge of the hive, will lay them under the split cane. From these depositories they may be removed and destroyed as often as necessary, with little trouble. A friend informs us that he knows the plan has been tried and found entirely successful."

IMPORTANT TO ENGINEERS.—To persons having the care of steam-engines the following from The Lawrenceburg Register may be valuable: "Mr. Ira Hill has informed us that he has accidently made a valuable discovery, by which the deposition of lime upon steam-boilers may be obviated. Two or three shovels of saw-dust are thrown into the boiler; after which process he never had any difficulty from lime, although using water strongly impregnated with it. He has always found the inside of his boilers as smooth as if just oiled. Whether the lime attaches itself to the floating particles of saw-dust, instead of the boiler, or whether the tanic acid in the oak saw-dust forms a salt with the lime which will not attach itself to the iron, remains to be explained. The saw-dust was placed in the boiler for the purpose of stopping a leak. The experiment is cheap and easily tried."

THE LEAVES OF THE COFFEE PLANT.—The Singapore Free Press recommends the use of the coffee leaf as a substitute for the berry. The writer appears to be an English planter of the Dutch settlement of Padang, in Sumatra, where the coffee plant has been cultivated for several generations, and where it is now produced in larger quantity, and of better quality than in any country of the Malayan Islands, Java excepted. The coffee-plant is an evergreen large shrub, which yields a profusion of leaves, and bears fruit for about twenty years. The leaf, and even the twigs have, in a minor degree, the same stimulating and exhilarating property as the berry, and its habitual use by the natives of the country, agricultural Malays of very simple habits, and little amenable to innovation, shows that they at least find the coffee leaf to make a wholesome and agreeable beverage.

PRINTED PREACHING.—The amount of good accomplished by an evangelical book or tract, printed and distributed, as it often is, by the thousand or ten thousand, is beyond all human computation. When the living preacher delivers a gospel sermon to three or four hundred fellow men, he is using the special means ordained of God for their conversion; but when he has done this, let him commit the thoughts and arguments that God has blessed, to the hands of the printer, and by a few revolutions of the press, he becomes at once the preacher of a thousand sermons, or if you please, the father of a thousand preachers! On the day of Pentecost three thousand souls were added to the Church by Peter's preached sermon—but who shall tell us the thousands that have been savingly benefited by reading the printed copy of that eloquent and powerful disconurse? [Home & For. The project of having a "great Coal Railroad" direct from the coal regions of Pennsylvania to this City, to bring an abundant supply of "cheap fuel," is about to be realized. The road is of the wide (six feet) gauge, and is already in operation from Scranton to Great Bend, where it connects with the New York and Erie, which gives it access to Western and Northern New York, where the road is doing quite an extensive coal business. The location of the road from Scranton to the Water Gap is confidently believed by its friends to be the only practicable direct route from the great anthracite coal fields of the Lackawana and Wyoming Valleys to this City.

There are about 1,000 men employed on the Williamsport and Elmira Railroad, which force is to be doubled within a short time.

THE BIBLE IN OUR COMMON SCHOOLS.

Number Four.

BY C. ROLLIN BURDICK, A. B.

The emotions of grandeur and sublimity are kindred emotions. Elevation is the cardinal cause of the emotion of sublimity. Thus, the contemplation of an eagle soaring aloft on tireless pinion, and piercing the clouds in its upward flight, produces this emotion. The ascending aeronaut also creates the same emotion. The Latin word sublimis, from which the word in question is derived, means high, elevated; hence the emotion of sublimity is simply an emotion produced by the contemplation of an elevated object, whether in the physical, intellectual, or moral world. The contemplation of a Washington, standing firm and unchangeable in his country's cause, amid the storms and tumults of the Revolution, and overcoming difficulties which to other men would have been insurmountable, produces this emotion in one of its most pleasing forms. If the contemplation of the acts of such a man is calculated to call forth this emotion, is not the contemplation of the life and acts of Jesus Christ calculated to call forth this emotion to a still intenser degree? I think it is. I challenge the whole world, past and present, to record a sublimer spectacle than Jesus Christ hanging on the cross, and at the same time praying for his enemies, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." The Bible portrays many scenes calculated to call forth such emotions.

The emotion of grandeur is called forth by the contemplation of great and elevated objects, either physical or moral; and greatness alone is capable of calling forth an emotion very nearly if not entirely similar. Thus, a mountain, with broad base and cloud-capped summit, always produces this emotion in the mind of the beholder; while the ocean, almost limitless in extent, produces an emotion very similar. Nearly associated with immense magnitude is great power, and from its kindred nature it is capable of calling forth the same emotion. Thus, Niagara, rushing down from the brink of so high a precipice, with such irresistible force, calls forth this emotion to an almost overwhelming degree. It should be remarked, that elevation, either moral or physical is generally connected with great power in the production of this emotion. Thus, an earthquake, though it shakes whole continents, and prostrates mighty cities, never produces the emotion of grandeur; while the thunder tempest, "careering chainless through the sky," and scattering its bolts of death in every direction; or the whirlwind, roaring and thundering through the forest, and prostrating every thing before its resistless march, conveys this emotion to an intense degree. And the Alpine avalanch, rushing down from its former bed high up among the clouds. sweeping away forests in its resistless descent, and plunging down from the brink of immense precipices, thousands of feet in perpendicular hight, burying whole hamlets in one common grave at their foot, presents a spectacle awfully grand. It hence arises, that descriptions which convey an idea of great power, mingled with moral, intellectual, or physical elevation, produce this emotion.

The Holy Bible abounds in such descriptions. One readily occurs: "God said, Let there be light, and there was light." The beauty of this passage, in its gramatical construction and prosodical harmony, hardly has a parallel, while it creates the emotions of grandeur and sublimity from the idea of power it conveys, and from the loftiness of the scene portrayed. God's descent upon Mount Sinai, and his giving the law from the cloud that rested upon its summit, amid the thunders that constantly bellowed from its dark recesses, and the lightnings that leaped out from its pavilion, and fringed its margin with glowing fire, is a scene at once awfully grand and sublime. Another description occurs, and it is only one among—I had like to have said—thousands: "He bowed the heavens also, and came down; and darkness was under his feet. And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly; yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind. He made darkness his secret place; His pavilion was dark waters and thick clouds of the skies." Another: "The voice of the Lord is upon many waters; the God of glory thundereth." The Revelator thus describes that day of rejoicing for all true believers, and a day of indescribable terrors for the wicked—the day of the final Judgment: "And I saw a great white throne, and Him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened, and another book was opened, which is the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things which are written in the book, according to their works."

I might continue to quote passages, until I have already, I think, quoted passages of the kind and alluded to scenes enough to establish the fact that the descriptions of the Bible produce as intense emotions of grandeur and sublimity as those of any other book, (though it may contain what are usually regarded the best models of literature,) while the scenes and events which it depicts have no equal in any other book whatever.

I have thus far been endeavoring to show that the Bible, as a literary production, has more points of worth to recommend it than any other book, and I flatter myself that I have accomplished my task, though not as successfully as one abler than myself could have done. But the literary qualifications of the Bible, though they are highly essential to its worth as a classic, are only a drop in a great ocean, compared with those higher recommendations of which I am about to speak—the moral teachings of the Bible. They are to these but the smallest star that illumes the darkness of midnight—beautiful though indeed it is—compared with the king of day, pouring down his full tide of noonday glory upon the rejoicing earth. In some respects, they are like the planets which circle around this great central luminary, many thousand times greater than all the planets, borrowing their light and heat from him; for it must be admitted, that many of these beautiful and sublime passages borrow most of their excellence from the glorious moral teachings of the Bible—teachings by precept, and what is still more valuable, teachings by example. I beg the forbearance of my readers while, I dwell upon these glorious, soul-entrancing themes. I will endeavor to make my remarks as interesting as I can.

The subject of imparting these moral teachings to our children, is of vital interest, because it concerns their future welfare, both in time and eternity. I wish to impress upon the minds of all parents the necessity of providing for their children to have this moral training in our schools. For this purpose I shall dwell at some length on this part of my subject, endeavoring to point out some of the moral excellences of the Bible, both as they affect the present life, and that interminable existence which we feel assured will follow. I have been led to believe, that our system of education is radically false in this direction, and that it is giving to the world too many unsanctified intellects. The world has already been cursed by too many men, who in intellect were giants, but in morals pigmies. All nations have groaned under this evil, and our own dear native land in especial manner, for the last quarter of a century. Alexander the Great—falsely so called—is an instance of the undue preponderance of the intellect over the moral powers. He never could have led his comparatively small army through all Asia, overturning every thing in his way, and vanquishing armies that outnumbered him tenfold, had he not been endowed with a mighty and far-reaching intellect; and he never would have done it, had his moral powers been developed in due proportion with his intellectual. Julius Cæsar is another instance of the same kind. He was a mighty man, but he who can enslave his own countrymen, and that too at the expense of seas of fraternal blood, is not good, though he be ever so great. Napoleon Bonaparte, that once humble Corsican boy, but afterwards the man who caused the world to tremble for its freedom, who decimated Europe by his wars, whose dread conquering banner waved over almost every land in Europe, and floated in triumph over the walls of almost every city—that man whose single power alone could inspire his troops to the performance of such deeds as were never before recorded—that man whose cannon thundered against the icebergs of the North, and upon the sunny plains of Italy, and the sandy deserts of Egypt, mingled with the roar of Atlantic's waves, and died away in reverberations amid the snow-clad summits of the Ural mountains—upon the field of Austerlitz, at the bridge of Lodi, at Marengo, at the gates of Paris, before the walls of the "eternal city"—that man whose fiery eagle, inspired by his own unconquerable genius, pounced down upon Britain's growling lion, and for a while seemed likely to come off victorious—what was he? An intellectual giant—a moral pigmy. It is a startling comment upon unsanctified human intellect, the life of that single man. The fact that one such man could carry desolation and death to so many heath-stones, and open the fountains of grief and woe in the hearts of so many widows and orphans, should, I think, at once arouse us to the necessity of giving our youth a proper moral training. I have often thought of it. Could the groan and death-shrieks of the wounded and dying, that arose from those hundred battle fields, and the sad lamentations of weeping mothers, widows and orphans, caused by them, be united in one despairing wail, the earth would reel as under the shock of an earthquake, and her very rocks would send forth floods of sympathizing tears. And yet such a man as Napoleon could look upon such scenes of desolation and misery unmoved. How many Napoleons are we now rearing by our system of education, who will only want the fitting time to become even more ambitious and reckless of human life than he? History is replete with such characters. The earth has been repeatedly deluged with blood by the ambition of unsanctified intellect. But evils which warriors have inflicted upon humanity are not the only evils which unsanctified human intellect have inflicted upon the earth. Who can compute the evil which Tom Paine, Voltaire, Byron, Dryden, Thompson, Bulwer, and Cooper, have done by their literary productions? How have they poisoned the hearts of thousands, and been the cause of sending multitudes of their fellow men to hell! Theirs were the works of unsanctified intellect, and well may we tremble when we see our children following in their footsteps, receiving a mental training to the neglect of the moral—tremble for their safety, and for the welfare of those over whom they may have an influence. Why do such laws as the "Fugitive Slave Law" have an existence upon any statue book under the heaven? It is because our legislators have no moral sense of their not before their eyes. They are the victims of a false education; and those who send them to our national halls, are the victims of the same evil. We must give our attention more to this subject, or our land will continue to groan under the accumulating burden of our sins, until finally, sick of us, she will cast us out as unworthy of inheriting her. It is unsanctified intellect that causes all the outrageous wrongs that curse humanity. How is the serf of Russia kept under bondage, but by the superior knowledge of the lord? How are the abuses of the Romish Church propagated, but by the controlling intellect of unprincipled priests? How are our American slaves ground down under the heel of oppression, but by this same agency? The answer is at once evident. If we would strike at the root, then, of these evils, we must commence with our youth, and accustom them, by an early moral culture, to respect the rights of their fellow men, and their duties and obligations to God. I know of no better place to do this, than in our common schools, in blessed union with the family and sanctuary.

WATKINS, N. Y., May 30, 1853.

VERSES IN OLD ENGLISH BIBLES.

The following verses appear in nearly all the Geneva editions of the translation of the Bible which was made during the reign of Queen Mary, by the illustrious exiles, John Knox, Miles Coverdale, and others:

Here is the spring where waters flowe,
To quench our heate of sinne;
Here is the tree where truth doth grow,
To lead our lives therein.

Here is the Judge that stints the strife.
Where men's devises faile;
Here is the bread that feedes the life,
That death cannot assaile.

The tidings of salvation deare,
Come to our eares from hence;
The fortresse of our faith is here,
And shield of our defense.

Then be not like the hogge, that hath
A pearle at his desire,
And takes more pleasure at the trough,
And wallowing in the myre.

Reade not this Booke. in any case,
But with a single eye;
Reade not, but first desire God's grace
To understand thereby.

Pray still in faith, with this respect,
To fructify therein;
That knowledge may bring this effect,
To mortify thy sinne.

Then happy thou in all thy life,
What so to thee befalles;
Yea, doubly happy shalt thou be,
When God by death thee calls.

JAPAN.

This country, though lying under the same latitudes as Spain and Italy, is yet very different from them in climate. At Matsmai, for instance, which is on the same parallel as Leghorn, snow falls as abundantly as at St. Petersburg, and lies in the valleys from November till April. Severe frost is uncommon, but cold fogs are exceedingly prevalent. The climate, however, is uncommonly diversified, and consequently so are the productions, exhibiting in some places the vegetation of the frigid zone, and in others that of the tropics.

Rice is the staple production of the soil. It is nearly the only article used instead of bread, and the only one from which strong liquor is distilled, while its straw serves for many domestic purposes. Besides the radishes, which abound, there is an extensive cultivation of various other esculent roots and vegetables. There is no coast without fisheries, and there is no marine animal that is not used for food, save those which are absolutely poisonous. But an uncommonly small quantity suffices for each individual. If a Japanese has a handful of rice and a single mouthful of fish, he makes a savory dish with roots, herbs, or mollusca, and it suffices for a day's support.

Japan produces both black and green tea; the former is very inferior, and used only for quenching thirst; whereas the latter is esteemed a luxury, and is presented to company. The best grows in the principality of Kioto, where it is carefully cultivated for the use both of the temporal and spiritual courts. Tobacco, which was first introduced by the European missionaries, has spread astonishingly, and is so well manufactured, that our author smoked it with a relish he had never felt for a Havana cigar. The Japanese smokes continually, and sips tea with his pipe, even rising for it during the night.

All articles of clothing are made of silk or cotton. The former appears to be very abundant, as rich dresses of it are worn even by common soldiers on festive days; and it may be seen on people of all ranks, even in poor towns. The fabrics are at least equal to those of China. The cotton of Japan seems to be of the same kind as that of our West Indian colonies. It furnishes the ordinary dress of the great mass of the people, and also serves all the other purposes for which we employ wool, flax, furs, and feathers. The culture of it is, of course, very extensive; but the fabrics are all coarse; Golownin could hardly make himself believe that his muslin cravat was of this material. There is some hemp, which is manufactured into cloth for sails, &c.; but cables and ropes, very inferior to ours, are made from the bark of a tree called kadyz. This bark likewise supplies materials for thread, lamp-wicks, writing-paper, and the coarse paper used for pocket-handkerchiefs.

There is no lack of fruit trees, as the orange, lemon, peach, plum, fig, chestnut, and apple; but the vine yields only a small, sour grape, perhaps for want of culture. Timber trees grow only in the mountainous districts, which are unfit for cultivation. Camphor is produced abundantly in the south, and large quantities of it are exported by the Dutch and Chinese. The celebrated varnish of Japan, drawn from a tree called silz, is so plentiful, that it is used for lacquering the most ordinary utensils. Its natural color is white, but it assumes any that is given to it by mixture. The best varnished vessels reflect the face as in a mirror, and hot water may be poured into them without occasioning the least small oxen for draught; cats and dogs are kept for the same uses as with us; and swine furnish food to the few sects who eat flesh. Sheep and goats seem to be quite unknown; the Russian captives had to make drawings of the former, to convey some idea of the origin of wool.

There are considerable mines of gold and silver in several parts of the empire, but the governmet does not permit them to be all worked, for fear of depreciating the value of these metals. They supply, with copper, the material of the currency, and are also liberally used in the decoration of public buildings, and in the domestic utensils of the wealthy. There is a sufficiency of quicksilver, lead, and tin, for the wants of the country; and one island is entirely covered with sulphur. Copper is very abundant, and of remarkably fine quality. All kitchen utensils, tobacco-pipes, and fire shovels, are made of it; and so well made, that our author mentions his tea-kettle as having stood on the fire, like all other Japanese kettles, day and night for months, without burning into holes. This metal is likewise employed for sheathing ships, and covering the joists and flat roofs of houses. Iron is less abundant, and much that is used is obtained from the Dutch. Nails alone, of which immense numbers are used in all carpentry-work, consume a large quantity. Diamonds, cornelians, jaspers, some very fine agates, and other precious stones, are found; but the natives seem not well to understand polishing them. Pearls are abundant; but not being considered ornamental, they are reserved for the Chinese market.

Steel and porcelain are the manufactures in which the Japanese chiefly excel, besides those in silk-stuffs and lacquered ware already mention. Their porcelain is far superior to the Chinese, but it is scarce and dear. With respect to steel manufactures, the sabers and daggers of Japan yield only perhaps to those of Damascus; and Golownin says their cabinet-makers' tools might almost be compared with the English. In painting, engraving and printing, they are far behind; and they seem to have no knowledge of ship-building or navigation beyond what suffices for coasting voyages, though they have intelligent and enterprising sailors. There is an immense internal traffic, for facilitating which there are good roads and bridges where water-carriage is impracticable. The distant Orientals have likewise bills of exchange and commercial gazettes. The emperor enjoys a monopoly of the foreign commerce.

It is popularly said, that Japan has two emperors—one spiritual, and the other temporal. The former, however, having no share in the administration of the empire, and seldom even hearing of state affairs, is no sovereign according to the ideas we attach to that term. He seems to stand much in the same relation to the emperor that the popes once did to the sovereigns of Europe. He governs Kioto as a small independent state; receives the emperor to an interview once in seven years; is consulted by him on extraordinary emergencies; receives occasional embassies and presents from him, and bestows his blessings in return. His dignity, unlike that of the Roman pontiffs, is hereditary, and he is allowed twelve wives, that his race may not become extinct. According to Japanese records, the present dynasty, including about 130 Kin-reys, has been maintained in a direct line for above twenty-four centuries. The person of the Kin-rey is so sacred, that no ordinary mortal may see any part of him but his feet, and that only once a year; every vessel which he uses must be broken immediately; for if another should even by accident eat or drink out of it, he must be put to death. Every garment which he wears must be manufactured by virgin hands, from the earliest process in the preparation of the silk.

The adherents of the aboriginal Japanese religion, of which the Kin-rey is the head, adore numerous divinities called Kami, or immortal spirits, to whom they offer prayers, flowers, and sometimes more substantial gifts. They also worship Kadotski or saints—mortals canonized by the Kin-rey—and build temples in their honor. The laws concerning personal and ceremonial purity, which form the principal feature of this religion, are exceedingly strict, not unlike those imposed on the ancient Jews. There are several orders of priests, monks, and nuns, whose austerity, like that of Europe, is maintained in theory more than in practice.

Three other creeds, the Brahminical, the Confucian, and that which deifies the heavenly bodies, have many adherents; but their priests all acknowledge a certain religious supremacy to exist in the Kin-rey. There is universal toleration in these matters; every citizen may profess what faith he chooses, and change as often as he chooses, without any one inquiring into his reasons; only it must be a spontaneous choice, for proselyting is forbidden by law. Christianity alone is proscribed, and that on account of the political mischief said to have been effected through its adherents in the seventeenth century. There is a law, by which no one may hire a servant without receiving a certificate of his not being a Christian; and on New Year's Day, which is a great national festival, all the inhabitants of Nangasaki are obliged to ascend a staircase, and trample on the crucifix, and other insignia of the Romish faith, which are laid on the steps as a test. It is said that many perform the act in violation of their feelings. So much of the religious state of the empire Golownin elicited in conversation with Teske and others; but every thing on this subject was communicated with evident reluctance; and though, in the course of the walks which they were permitted to take in harness, the Russian captives sometimes saw the interior of the temples, they were never permitted to enter while any religious rites were celebrated.

With respect to the civil administration of Japan, our author seems to have gathered little that was absolutely new to us. The empire comprises above 200 states, which are governed as independent sovereignties by princes called Damyos, who frame and them are powerful; the damyo of Sindai, for instance, visits the imperial court with a retinue of 60,000. Their dependence on the emperor appears chiefly in their being obliged to maintain a certain number of troops, which are at his disposal. Those provinces which belong directly to the emperor, are placed under governors, called Bunyos, whose families reside at the capital as hostages. Every province has two Bunyos, each of whom spends six months in the government and six at Yedo.

The supreme council of the emperor consists of five sovereign princes, who decide on all ordinary measures without referring to him. An inferior council of fifteen princes or nobles presides over important civil and criminal cases. The general laws are few and well known. They are very severe; but the judges generally find means of evading them where their enforcement would involve a violation of those of humanity. In some cases, as in conjugal infidelity or filial impiety, individuals are permitted to avenge their own wrong, even to the taking of life. Civil cases are generally decided by arbitrators, and only when they fail to settle a matter is there recourse to the public courts of justice. Taxes are generally paid to the reigning prince or emperor, in tithes of the agricultural, manufactured, or other productions of the country.

Such were some of the leading particulars ascertained by Golownin concerning the social and civil condition of this singular people. He says, they always appeared very happy, and their demeanor was characterized by lively and polite manners, with the most imperturbable good temper. It seems at length to have been through fear of a Russian invasion, rather than from any sense of justice, that his Japanese majesty, in reply to the importunities of the officers of the Diana, consented to release the captives, on condition of receiving from the Russian government a solemn disavowal of having sanctioned the proceedings of Chwostoff. Having obtained this, the officers repaired for the fourth time to these unfriendly shores, and enjoyed the happiness of embracing their companies, and taking them on board. [Chambers' Journal.

THE DWARF COUPLE.

If we had but discerning eyes, we could read in the accidentals and little occurrences of every-day life many chapters of instruction.

Sometimes the language is so striking, that dull perception is forced to understand it; as in the following instance, where I read a beautiful lesson from the homely page of incident. I give it as noted down in my Diary:

September 4.—This morning, as I was passing through the hall, I noticed a couple entering, whose singular appearance arrested my attention. They were a man and woman of the same height, but both much underseized. Their dress was tidy, but quaint in the extreme, and in the person of each was such an entire absence of every line of grace or beauty, that one would suppose such awkward-looking bodies must really feel uncomfortable. I was beginning to regard them as a very grotesque pair, but my mirth was checked upon observing that the woman was entirely sightless.

Alas! thought I, how unequally the gifts of God are distributed! Here is deformity, poverty, and blindness! What accumulated misfortunes! Would that I could do something to alleviate so sad a fate. My meditation of condolence was interrupted by an awkward bow from the man to myself, at the same time asking, in a brisk tone, "Would you like to look at some first rate shoes?" He produced some shoes as extraordinary looking as the venders themselves. I could scarcely repress a smile at his evident pride in the article; but he went on to say, "They'll outwear four pair of shoemakers' shoes. These, you see, are made by my wife Molly. She's blind, you see, but she cuts these out and sews them every stitch herself." The woman stood by with that calm, resigned expression, peculiar to the blind. I said to her, "My friend, is it possible you are able to make these without eyesight?—how long ago did you lose it?" "I lost both my eyes," she replied, "before I was two years old."

I turned to her husband in surprise, and asked, "Did you marry her blind? Were you not afraid to undertake the care of her?" "The care of Molly!" said the man, with a merry laugh, "why, she has made my fortune. I never had any thing I could call my own till I married her, and now we live snug enough." Then he went on to expatiate upon his treasure, Molly. "Why, you see how tidy she keeps me. She cuts, and makes, and mends all my clothes. I don't find any shoes easy to my feet but Molly's. Then, if she wants to go any where, she's only to take hold of my arm, and I lead her. I'm the sexton at ——, and when there are no funerals, I like to bring Molly down to town, and we sell a few shoes, just to amuse us and help along. It makes me able to get her all the little notions she wants." This man, whom I had approached as a disconsolate beggar, was speaking with animation, and a countenance radiant with satisfaction; and the object beside him I though so forlorn, her sightless face glowed with the

Sweet and merry sunshine of affection's gentle light,
That never wears a sullen cloud, and fadeth not in night.

Here was most poetically illustrated the foundation sentiment of matrimonial happiness—reciprocation, interchange of kindness. Molly found her happiness in clothing her husband, and adding to his means by making shoes. Her husband found his in leading his benighted Molly about, and supplying her wants. Homely as is the guise of this faithful pair, there is more of romance in their history and intercourse than in connexions where gifted youth and beauty are bartered for gold and position. "But," said I to Molly, "do you never feel unhappy in being deprived of sight?"

"Oh, no; I never grieved about that much since I came to feel that it was all right. I can always busy myself about something. seek to be a good woman. After he has laid a few more in their narrow house, we shall follow, and in my long home I shall see." I no longer wondered over the unequally distributed gifts of God's providence, but admired that principle of compensation which places happiness within the reach of all, independent of gifts or circumstances. Its springs are in the inner man, and flow outward. The morale of this day's lesson I will write thus—"Godliness with contentment is great gain!"

INCIDENTS IN BIBLE COLPORTAGE.

In one house I found three Roman Catholics, two men and a woman. As soon as I entered, I placed the case of Bibles before them, and handed a copy to the head of the family, and asked him, "Do you want a good book, sir?"

He took it, and after examining it some time in silence, he said, "That is a good book; no house ought to be without it."

The man sitting by, who was the head of another family living near, asked, "But will that kind do for you, William?"

"To be sure it will," he replied. "I have examined it before, and have compared it with the Douay, and the difference is very little; some words are different, but the meaning is the same."

After they had conversed together some time, I asked William, "Have you got a Bible? you have said no house ought to be without it."

"Well," said he, "I must tell you the truth, I have not."

"Now is a good time for you to get one; suppose you take this?"

He looked at the book thoughtfully, and showed it to his wife; at length he said, "I have no money by me; if I had, I would surely buy it."

Said I, "I shall pass by your house again; suppose you take it, and pay for it at another time."

He took it, and with his wife seemed well pleased at obtaining the Scriptures. I then turned to the other man, and asked, "Have you got a Bible?"

"No, sir, and I don't want one of that kind."

"Does T. B. live in this neighborhood?"

"He does."

"Where can I find him at this time of day?"

He smiled, and replied, "Not far from here. I am the man."

"I am glad to meet you, Thomas; I have some good news for you. Do you know Mr. G.?"

"Indeed I do; I have worked for him many a day, and a fine man he is too."

"He sends you this Bible, and wants you to take it as a gift from him."

"Well, I shan't take it; he has often told me I must have a Bible, and I have battled with him many an hour. I told him I would not have the book, and I don't want it."

"But is not G. your friend, and will you refuse a gift from him?"

"He is a fine man, and as obliging as any man I ever knew. I was once about to buy a horse for my accommodation; but he told me it would be very expensive to keep him, and that I had better not buy one; any time, said he, when you want to use a horse, just come to me, and you shall have the free use of one or two, as you may need. Mr. G. has always been a kind neighbor to me."

"Well, Thomas, you can do as you please. Mr. G. has paid for that Bible, and directed me to give it to you, and I should like to have you take it."

Upon this he took the Bible into his hands, and observed, that Mr. G. was very kind. Said I, "Shall I put your name in it?"

"Oh no, I will write it myself."

"Well, do as you like about that; I thought it would be well to put your name in the book, as a present from Mr. G."

"Certainly," said he; "you may write my name in it, and Mr. G.'s too."

I did so, and took my leave. Mr. G. some days previous had met me at his own residence, told me of Thomas, and had given me the commission I had just now executed. Thus were two destitute families furnished with the Divine Book. J. M. C.

EXPENSIVE CONVERSION.

We read in the Ackbar of Algiers: "In the reign of Braham ben Mamlouk, in 1819, a Jew became a Mussulman, under the name of Abdaliah. Some years after, he married an Arab woman, who died without leaving him any children. He afterwards married an other Mussulman woman, by whom he had a daughter. Every one thought this man sincerely converted to Islamism, when, a few days back, a rumor was current that he had again returned to the religion of Moses. This news turned out to be true, and the following strange ceremonies, we are informed, took place on his reception: The rabbis commenced by cutting the nails of his hands and feet as close as possible to the flesh. They then had his head shaved, only two locks of hair being left, one on each side of the head. He next was made to take a cold bath in a vessel kept in the synagogue; and if he is really converted, he is to proceed there for six months at least, and take a similar bath at break of day. During this bath some eggs were broken on his head, which was then carefully washed. On leaving the bath a shirt was placed on him, and forty blows of a stick were administered to him on the back. He was then placed in a hole, and every one present threw a small stone at him. This operation being terminated, new clothes were given him, and the old ones were burned. He was, in addition, ordered to fast for a certain length of time. Finally, he has been directed to whitewash his shop in the Rue Combes, and to perfume it, and all the merchandize which it contains, with incense. During a period of seven days, he is to eat ashes, to purify his body. The Jews are tormenting him to make his daughter also change her religion, declar-

REGENERATION.

Reply to D. E. M.--Continued from last week.

I must now expose some of your inconsistency. In your effort to convict me of self-contradiction, you say, "If a man is already obedient, there is no need of regeneration at all; for it is the very purpose of regeneration, to secure this obedience. The truth is, that neither this clergyman, nor any other unregenerate man, ever obeyed at all," &c. Thank you for this admission. Now look at the first part of your article, where, in view of the fact that you are charged with maintaining that "a natural man, dead in trespasses and sins, that is, one in whom there is no holiness at all, may put forth a holy act," you "unhesitatingly plead guilty," and profess yourself "ready for trial before the tribunal of reason and revelation." And, repudiating my position, that "the holy intention is the product or effect of the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit, and shows that the work has already been accomplished," you say that, according to your view, the sinner "cannot possibly be a holy being, until he puts forth this holy intention; for it is this very intention which constitutes his holiness, and at all times he can put forth that intention." Now do tell how it is, that "no unregenerate man ever obeyed at all," and that, "if he did, there would be no need of regeneration," and yet that he cannot possibly become regenerate until he obeys; for to me it looks wondrously like a contradiction.

You "admit that the work of the Holy Spirit stands in intimate relationship to this change of intention which makes the new creature," but you deny that it is the relationship of cause. "It is the relationship of condition," you say. You assert, in so many words, that the office of the Holy Spirit is "not to regenerate, but to teach the truth." Well, I had always thought that the people of God were born of the Spirit. John 3: 5, 6. I read Paul to the Galatians, "If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit," and always supposed that he carried the idea, that Christians had been quickened to newness of life by the Holy Spirit. And when I read his argument to the Corinthians, (2 epist. chap. 3,) where he holds himself to be a "minister of the New Covenant; not of the letter, but of the Spirit; for the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life," I thought the point was settled. For I thought he taught, very clearly, that owing to the depravity of the heart, the ministration of the letter merely, would but increase man's guilt, and so prove to him "the ministration of death." I thought he taught that the Gospel was the ministration of life, because it was more than the mere ministration of the letter; that, unlike the Law, which simply prescribed the letter of duty, it accompanied the letter with a life-giving work of the Holy Spirit, so that, when the hearer had his duty laid before him, he did not rebel against it, but said, "O how love I thy law!" I thought the Apostle would not have reasoned as he did, if he meant to carry the idea, that the Gospel was the means of life to dead sinners merely by making the way of salvation more plain to the understanding: for that (it appeared to me) would not give sinners that decided and radical advantage, which he claimed for them, above what they enjoyed under the Law. So I came to the conclusion, that the grand idea set forth by the Apostle was this: that the Law killed, because, when ministered, it came into contact with a heart too corrupt to render a willing obedience; but that the Gospel gave life, because, though coming into contact with hearts too depraved to render obedience to it, it is nevertheless accompanied with that renovating influence of the Holy Spirit which effectually overcomes this difficulty. And when I considered, that believers were "manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God, not in tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart," I did not see what room there was for cavil. The passage taught me that, as the finger of God had once written the Law in tables of stone, so there was an analogous operation of the Holy Spirit by way of writing Christ in the hearts of his people; and that, in virtue of this operation, they became "an epistle known and read of all men." Indeed, I see not how this argument of the Apostle can be evaded; nor do I see that, (so far as our sanctification, or meetness for the kingdom of heaven, is concerned,) we are any better off under the Gospel, than they were under the Law, if the Holy Spirit does nothing more than simply furnish the truth, leaving us to complete the work of regeneration ourselves.

There is another passage, to which I invite your attention. "For we ourselves were sometimes foolish and disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another. But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards man appeared, he saved us, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Spirit." Titus 3: 3—5. The applicability of the passage is this: that it declares the salvation of God's people, or their deliverance from the reigning power of sin, to have been effected, "not by works of righteousness which they have done." This method of deliverance is set aside entirely, and the whole work is ascribed to God's mercy, exercising itself in the regenerating and sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit upon their hearts. But if your doctrine be true, the Holy Spirit does but simply furnish the truth, (or the condition of regeneration, to use your own term,) and leaves it for the sinner to use it in such a way as to regenerate himself! Is this a "work of righteousness" on the sinner's part, or not? If it is, the Apostle's doctrine is not true.

But I need not multiply quotations from Scripture; your own language indicates your want of confidence in your own creed. You talk about "the eloquent pleadings of the Spirit burning the truth into the sinner's very soul." You tell us, "God's work is performed, and all performed, when he sends the Holy Spirit to hold and urge the truth to the sinner's mind." And in your former communication you say, that "the Holy Spirit is the agent, by which the truth is brought home to the conscience of the sinner, and held there." I should like to know how much is meant by such expressions. What do you mean by "burning the truth into the sinner's very soul?" What by "holding and urging the truth to his mind?" What by "bringing it home to the conscience of the sinner, and holding it there?" Do you attach any definite idea to these expressions, or not? If the Spirit "burns the truth into the sinner's soul," I take it that the Holy Spirit is a living, intelligent agent, personally present with the sinner to perform the burning operation. If he "brings home the truth to the conscience—holds and urges it to the mind," I still infer his active agency, and, by consequence, his personal (not visible) presence. If he employs "eloquent pleadings," I infer the same. If these expressions mean any thing more than mere rhapsody, they must mean something very analogous to the idea for which I myself am contending. I take it, therefore, that your heart is better than your head, and that you do not more than half believe the doctrine you advocate.

I shall not trifle with you so much as to ask, whether you suppose the Holy Spirit to stand before the sinner in visible, bodily shape, and to use audible words, when he pleads eloquently, and burns the truth into the sinner's soul. I will not ask, if you think he pleads and argues as one man pleads and argues with another, giving variety to his language, and using tone, and gesture, and vivid looks, to enforce his appeals. For I take it, that you remember that passage of Scripture, which teaches his invisibility to mortal eyes. John 14: 17. His "eloquent pleadings," therefore, must either be the simple words of Scripture, all written out and left upon record eighteen hundred years ago, or else some operation over and above the mere presentation of truth, invisible, intangible, but nevertheless real and effective. The same must be said of his work of "bringing home the truth to the conscience," "holding and urging it to the mind," "burning it into the soul," &c. If the former is the truth, then the mission of the Holy Spirit was all fulfilled when the canon of Scripture was completed, and his converting and sanctifying power resides wholly in the written word. He has nothing now to do, and prayer for his divine influences is superstition. If this is your position, avow it plainly; if not, tell us how much your expressions mean.

If the office of the Holy Spirit is merely "to teach the truth, that men may have no excuse for their unholiness," (as you maintain,) I cannot understand what there is for him to do, more than he has already done and completed eighteen centuries ago. That he makes any new revelations, I presume you will not contend. That he suggests any ideas different from what are already embodied in Scripture, will not be pretended by any well informed person. And unless you admit his work to be something like what I am contending for, (to which your own expressions—"burning the truth into the soul," "bringing it home to the conscience," &c.—give a seeming countenance,) I cannot see that he does any thing. It is the creature, after all, who does the work. To call it the work of the Holy Spirit, merely because the Spirit furnishes the means, or "condition," is not a candid way of dealing with the obvious teachings of inspiration.

With those who hold as I do, it is perfectly consistent to say, that the Holy Spirit applies the truth to the conscience—urges it upon the mind—burns it into the very soul—makes the sinner see it, feel it, believe it. For they hold that the light which the Holy Spirit thus gives, is the "light of LIFE." But with persons of your belief, such language seems to be either destitute of meaning, or at most but a figurative description of the work which the preacher performs, when, by a skillful arrangement and presentation of inspired truth, he pleads with sinners, and beseeches them to be reconciled to God. Under such "eloquent pleadings," many a sinner has been made to tremble, as Felix before Paul; but that the work upon him was that same kind of work which, in other cases, is attended with the new creation of the soul in the image of Christ, I cannot admit, for reasons which will be more fully presented in a future number.

THE HANSERD KNOLLYS SOCIETY.—This Society was organized in London, several years ago, for the purpose of reprinting works of the early Baptists, illustrative of their doctrines and history. It has already issued several works, among which are Tracts on Liberty of Conscience, The Broadmead Records, Roger Williams' Bloudy Tenent of Persecution, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (copy of the original edition,) Canne's Necessitie of Separation, one volume of Dutch Martyrolgy, and DuVeil's Exposition of the Acts of the Apostles. It is now proposed to terminate the series of publications with three more volumes, two of them to conclude the Martyrology, and the third to embrace Confessions of Faith of the Baptists in the seventeenth century. Inadequate support is the reason given for discontinuing the publications. It is intimated that the Society will not disband, and we hope that the publication of old works will soon be resumed.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Efforts to promote Sunday Sanctification.

GLASGOW, May 20, 1853.

It is, and long has been, our conviction, early expressed in the Sabbath Recorder, that the Church, rejecting as she does God's Sabbath, would not always be permitted to appeal to the universality of public sanction to the day of her adoption. A gradual yet progressive disregard to the traditions by which the Sabbath law has been made void, we fully anticipated—and that anticipation is now shared in by those who still cling to the perversion; or at least, fears are entertained by such that our anticipations may prove true. At the Annual Meeting of the Societies for British Missions, held in London last week, the Chairman, T. Barnes, Esq., M. P., said, "The time may come, when the barriers which have hitherto guarded the outward observance of the Sabbath [meaning, as he did, the Sunday,] may be broken down—when it will be no longer a legalized day of rest, but when it will be open to all to spend it as they may—when we may see our shops open, our places of amusement flooded, our public conveyances plying as frequently or more so than on other days." That all this is yet to be realized, and honest-hearted lovers of the Lord be left free to take His day, we believe to be true; and we therefore continue still to chronicle its prognostications.

Last Sabbath, a numerous deputation waited on our Prime Minister, the Earl of Aberdeen, to solicit Government coöperation in opposition to Sunday Trading in the Metropolis. The deputation was introduced by Mr. Apsley Pellatt, M. P., who stated that it was composed of tradesmen who were anxious to be strict Sunday observers. It was stated, that a Bill having the object in view had been prepared, and had a great many friends and supporters in Parliament; but they had reason to complain of the manner in which former Bills had been treated in the House of Commons; for, as the discussion always came on Wednesdays, those who opposed it had nothing to do in order to gain their purpose, but to talk till 6 o'clock. The working classes, the deputation said, were specially anxious for the passing of the Bill, to facilitate which its promoters had taken care that "religious views were no where sought to be enforced;" for they "kept quite apart from the religious view of the question. The Bill was confined strictly to the sale of goods, and even then made exceptions in favor of perishable goods, and articles of the first necessity." Mr. Hatch said, "he had himself addressed numerous public meetings on the subject, and had always broadly stated, that they sought no interference with man's religious opinions, be he Jew, Mahommedan, or Christian;" but he certainly did not, on the present occasion, explain how, if their Bill were made law, the Christian or the Jew who observed God's Sabbath was to be permitted to do his work on the first day. Mr. Briscoe, from St. Luke's parish, said he had resided in that parish for twenty-five years, and in conjunction with the parish officers had done every thing in his power to procure a better observance of the Lord's day, [for so he was pleased to term Sunday,] but as the law stood at present, all such efforts must prove unavailing." "There was one street in St. Luke's, a sort of market, which was more busy on Sunday than all the other days of the week. Nearly all the shops were open, and articles of every description were publicly sold." Mr. Barrow complained of the state of Bedfordbury on Sundays, "the shops being all open, even during the hours of divine service." Mr. Gillott stated, that "in Berwick street the trade was carried on openly on Sundays." Mr. Hayman said, "there were at the present moment 10,000 shops in London which regularly opened" on Sundays, "and 40,000 persons trading on that day, not only in consumable and perishable articles, but in clothing, boots, and shoes, and various other manufactured articles." Yet these gentlemen said that the opposition to such a Bill as they proposed, and as they had been vainly striving to have passed through the House of Commons during the last eight years, "arose entirely from a small remnant of the Chartist party, and not from the laboring classes. It was stated, that the Bill was an improvement upon that formerly introduced by Mr. Hindley; and that the reason of their application to his Lordship was, "that they wished to avoid the House of Commons."

The Earl of Aberdeen replied, that avoiding the House of Commons was quite out of the question; [and I may add, that the wish itself is likely to be remembered against them in that House, on some future occasion, when such a subject comes to be again discussed;] and he did not think, looking at the divided state of public opinion, that it would be right to make it a Government Bill, and give to it the usual facilities of such a measure. His own impression was, that the Government should wait for a very general concurrence of public opinion, before they acted more prominently in the matter—and I think that if, before guarding more stringently Sunday sacredness, they wait for more general public favor, they will be in the condition of him who waits till the river runs past. "Sabbatarian notions," his Lordship added, "might be carried too far." "Besides, if all the tradesmen were agreed, they could act independently of the remnant of the Chartists, and could effect the change themselves." "His impression was, that perhaps the poor laboring man was not as well represented by the deputation as he might be by others of his own class." "If it were true that they could not get their measure carried through the House of Commons, he must look upon that fact as a proof that the opposition was greater than the deputation had represented. He could not imagine that a few Chartists could offer permanent obstruction to the Bill." He was himself favorable to Sunday observance, and in regard to the request to grant to the promoters one of the Government days in the House of Commons, he would speak to Lord John Russell, who had there the management of the Government business. But they were aware, that the time of the House was very much occupied at present. He should have thought, however, that the proper course would have been, for them to have seen the Secretary of State, in whose province the question properly lay. In point of fact, he (the Earl of Aberdeen) had nothing at all to do with it."

In order that the amount of progress thus made towards replacing Sunday among "the six working days," may be fully perceived, it is only farther necessary that I add, that his Lordship is a Presbyterian, reputed to have, in some measure, the fear of the Lord before him.

J. A BEGG.

CHURCH ACTION ON SLAVERY.

The General Assembly of that branch of the Presbyterian Church commonly called New School, was held recently at Buffalo, N. Y., where several subjects of general interest were brought up and acted upon. One was the growing habit of Dancing among Christians, which the Assembly decided to be wrong and sinful. Another was marriage between an uncle and his niece, which was pronounced wrong. A third was "Sabbath traveling," in relation to which the Assembly expressed its opinion, that church members should not travel on Sunday, except to and from church, or on some errand of necessity or mercy. But the most important and troublesome subject of all was Slavery, upon which a long discussion arose, leading to threats, on the part of the representatives of some northern churches, that they would secede if decided action was not taken, and on the part of the representatives of some southern churches, that they would secede if such action was taken. After nearly a whole day spent upon the subject, the Assembly adopted the following report of a Committee —which we copy, to show how cautiously that giant evil is approached by this branch of the Christian Church, as well as to show how small a matter did in this case kindle a great fire.

Report of the Committee on Slavery.

The Committee to which was referred the subject of Slavery, report, that 12 memorials from different Synods and Presbyteries, have come into their hands. Of these memorials 11 are from the North, praying the Assembly for further action, and asking for particular information in regard to the extent of the practice of Slaveholding in the Presbyterian Church, and in regard also to certain alledged aggravations of it in the unchristian and cruel treatment of the Slaves.

One memorial is from the South, complaining of the injustice of Northern brethren in charging upon them practices of which they are not guilty, and attributing to them motives which they abhor, and protesting against the continued agitation of the subject, as tending more to rivet than unloose the chains of the Slave, and seriously to embarrass the memorialists in their Gospel work.

The Committee, after much patient and prayerful consideration of the whole subject, in all its complicated and perplexing relations, are agreed in recommending to the Assembly the following action:

1. That this body shall reäffirm the doctrine of the second resolution adopted by the General Assembly convened in Detroit in 1850; and,

2. That with an express disavowal of any intention to be impertinently inquisitorial, and for the sole purpose of arriving at the truth, so as to correct misapprehensions and allay all causeless irritation, a Committee be appointed of one from each of the Synods of Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri and Virginia, who shall be requested to report to the next General Assembly on the following points:

1. The number of slaveholders in connection with the Churches, and the number of slaves held by them;

2. The extent to which slaves are held from an unavoidable necessity imposed by the laws of the States, the obligations of guardianship, and the demands of humanity;

3. Whether the Southern Churches regard the sacredness of the Marriage relation as it exists among the slaves; whether Baptism is only administered to the children of the slaves professing Christianity; and, in general, to what extent and in what manner provision is made for the religious well-being of the enslaved.

Your Committee recommend,

4. That this Assembly do earnestly exhort and beseech all those in our Church who are happily relieved from any personal connection with the institution of Slavery, to exercise due patience and forbearance toward their brethren less fortunate than themselves, remembering the embarrassments of their peculiar position, and to cherish for them that fraternal confidence and love to which, as Christian brethren, they are entitled, and which they the more need in consequence of the peculiar trials by which they are surrounded.

The following is the resolution adopted at Detroit, referred to in the above report:

Resolved, That the holding of our fellowmen in the condition of Slavery, except in those cases where it is unavoidable by the laws of the State, the obligations of guardianship, or the demands of humanity, is an offense in the proper import of that term as used in the Book of Discipline, chap. I. sec. 3, and should be regarded and treated in the same manner as other offenses.

ANTI-BIBLE CONVENTION.

A Convention, called professedly for the purpose of deciding upon the authenticity of the Scriptures, but managed almost exclusively by those who deny their authenticity, was held last week at Hartford, Ct. The attendance was small, and the discussions, if we may judge from telegraphic reports of them, were not remarkably interesting. Andrew Jackson Davis, Henry C. Wright, and Wm. Lloyd Garrison, were leading spirits and prominent speakers on the occasion. Mr. Davis delivered the opening address, in which he expressed his opinion, that "religion was not to be found between the covers of any book," and that "the more a man knows, the less he believes." Mr. Garrison introduced a series of resolutions, the substance of which was, "that the doctrine of the American Church and Priesthood, that the Bible is the word of God—that whatever it contains was given by Divine inspiration, and that it is the only rule of faith and practice—is self-evidently absurd, exceedingly injurious both to the intellect and soul, highly pernicious in its application, and a stumbling block in the way of human redemption." The general drift of remark seemed to be to the effect that the heart of man in itself is sufficient to guide him aright through life, and lead him to happiness hereafter, without the aid of Divine revelation. Of course, the Christian Church came in for a large share of denunciation, on account of the doctrines she has taught and is now teaching, and the influence which it is claimed her ministers exert to fetter the freedom of thought and discussion.

One of the speakers is thus described by the correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune:—

"Then followed an aged gentleman, by the name of Wm. Stillman, an old wheel-horse in the cause of anti-slavery and free discussion, who was so full of his subject, that he could not well get out what he had to say. He was fervent, and would have been eloquent, if the words had not so obstinately refused to come. The sturdy veteran said he had always gone for free discussion, and always would, and wanted to see the Convention go on. But that, while he sympathized on many points with the friends he saw around him, he did not agree with them at all on the Bible question. 'I know,' said he, 'that the Bible is true, and that it is the Word of God, and I know that you cannot shake that. You may bring on your learned men, and your able men, and your ingenious men—I don't care for all of them. I know my Bible is true, and you can't show it to be otherwise. It is all I've got left in this world, and I mean to stick to it. If I cannot rely upon that, I cannot rely upon any thing. But I don't fear it will fall from all your attacks. I just as much expect this house will fall upon my head, and bury me beneath its ruins, as that the Bible will fall. I don't care for your great men, nor your little men. I hope you will excuse me, but I must say, that while I agree with you upon the rum question, and the slavery question, and upon many other questions, upon this I pity your delusion. You had better stick to anti-slavery and anti-rum. And this is just the place to begin. I have just been to New York, and that State is going ahead in reform. But as for Connecticut, she is going astern. And as for this city, it is a sink of pollution. Hartford is an awful place. It is no better than Sodom, and I have fears that God will destroy it.' The old man was greeted with feeble applause, and tottered back to his seat. Yet he made a more practical speech than any the Convention is likely to hear."

PROGRESS OF METHODISM.

A correspondent of the Christian Advocate and Journal gives the following view of the increase of Methodists in New York:—

During the Revolutionary war, the population had diminished very much, as many had fled to the country on the approach of the British army, and a great portion of the City was consumed by fire soon after that event; so that great suffering ensued, and many deaths occurred. On these accounts, the number of inhabitants had so decreased, that in 1780 there could not have been over 15,000, as the entire population did not exceed 23,000 at the commencement of the war. Allowing this to be accurate, the number of the several decades from that time to 1850 will stand as follows, with the number of Methodists, and their proportion to the population in parallel columns:—

Year.	No. of Citizens.	No. of Methodists.	Proportion of Members.
1780	15,000	100	1 in 150
1790	33,131	684	1 in 53
1800	60,489	770	1 in 80
1810	96,373	2,260	1 in 42
1820	128,706	3,221	1 in 55
1830	202,589	3,955	1 in 51
1840	312,852	6,091	1 in 51
1850	515,507	8,130	1 in 63

This is as far as the census of the City has been taken, but allowing that in 1852 the population amounted to 570,000, which it probably did, and as the number of Methodists at that date was 9,215, the proportion would be as 1 to 61, which is a little increase from 1850. From this estimation of comparison it will be seen that the least proportion was in 1780, when it was as 1 in 150; and that the next least was in 1800, when it was 1 in 80; and that the largest was in 1710, when it was 1 in 42; and that the next largest was in 1820 and 1840, when it was 1 in 55; and in 1850, when it was 1 in 63. It will be perceived, therefore, that since 1780 we have kept a pretty steady pace with the increase of the population, though since 1840 there has been rather a retrogade motion, from 1 in 51 to 1 in 63 and 1 in 61.

A Christian Union Convention (anti-creed, anti-sect) is called to assemble in Syracuse on the 8th and 9th inst. Gerrit Smith, Chas. A Wheaton, and Rev. S. J. May, are among the signers of the Call.

COPY OF A LETTER

Addressed to a Brother who has lately left the Sabbath of the Lord.

MY DEAR BROTHER,—The clock has this morning struck one, and I have been thinking of some of my very near friends, brethren and sisters, who have rejected the Lord Jesus Christ, so far, at least, as his being "LORD of the Sabbath day." Thus far, his lordship is rejected, in favor of the lordship of the "Man of Sin."

I regret, exceedingly, that while thousands are turning to keep "the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus"—are standing in the way, and "asking for the old paths," in which Christ and his disciples walked, when they "rested the Sabbath day according to the commandment"—that some others should be turning away from the commandment of God, to keep the commandments of men, or to the "no-Sabbath" doctrine. Surely, "it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them." 2 Pet. 2: 21. This must be very displeasing to the Lord of the Sabbath, who said, "Howbeit, in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men; for, laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men." Mark. 3: 17.

You may say to me, as a Free-will Baptist brother did the other day, when speaking of the Sabbath of the Lord, "It is not essential to salvation." But how do we know that to keep the commandments of God, as well as the faith of Jesus, is not essential to salvation, when the Judge of all the earth has said, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments?" Matt. 19: 17. The young man being so particular as to inquire "which" of the commandments, as though some of them were more essential than others, (when Jesus had already included the whole, in saying, "the commandments," then Jesus referred him to what is called the second table of the law, viz., "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." But the young man, having loved this present world more than the cross of Christ, "went away sorrowful."

Now, if Jesus Christ, the Judge of all the earth, has said in his last revelation to man, "Blessed are they that do his [that is, God's] commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city," (Rev. 22: 14,) can we add to or take from this revelation? Can we say, Blessed are they that do not God's commandments, and promise life to the ungodly, and to those who love or make a lie, saying, "the first day of the week is the Sabbath," or, that there is no Sabbath, "made for man?"

As for myself, my dear brother, I had rather part with my right hand, than to part with the Sabbath of my Lord Jesus in favor of the Sabbath of the Man of Sin, who has "changed times and laws." Dan. 7: 25.

Yours affectionately,

R. C.

WORLD'S TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

The following Call for a World's Temperance Convention comes to us over the names of Reuben H. Walworth of New York, and thirty-four other distinguished friends of temperance, of whom one is from each State in the Union, one from Canada, and one from New Brunswick. We hope it may lead to a gathering worthy of the cause:—

Whereas, At a meeting convened in the City of New York, on the 12th of May, 1853, preparatory to a World's Temperance Convention in the City of New York, during the World's Fair, it was Resolved, That such a Convention be held in said city on the 6th of September next; and Whereas, The undersigned were appointed a Committee of one from each State, Territory, and Province, to call such Convention;

Therefore, in fulfillment of our appointment, and with the full conviction of the wisdom and utility of such a Convention, we do hereby heartily issue an invitation to all Temperance associations and organizations, based on the principle of entire abstinence from the use and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, to appear, by their representatives, in the City of New York, on the 6th day of September next, at 10 o'clock A. M., with a view of continuing in session four days, holding public meetings and transacting such business as may come before them; more especially in reference to the enactment of a prohibitory law, by the Governments of all States and nations. And we do furthermore extend our invitation to the friends of Temperance in every part of the world, assuring them of a cordial welcome to the meeting, and an opportunity to exhibit fully the advance of the cause in their own respective districts.

INTERESTING SLAVE CASE.—An interesting slave case has been before one of the Courts of New York for a while past. A colored child, named Jane Trainer, was brought from Alabama to this city, on the way to California, by a woman who formerly owned and sold its mother as a slave. The father of the child was a free colored man, and he attempted here to get possession of his offspring by aid of the law. But the laws of Alabama do not recognize the marriage of a free black man with a white woman, and hence the case became somewhat complicated. After a good deal of time had been spent upon it, the Court decided that it had no jurisdiction in the matter, and the child was taken possession of by its claimant, a woman whose character for chastity does not stand high. Subsequently the father obtained an injunction, restraining the woman from taking the child out of the State, and from keeping, detaining, or interfering with her, till the further order of the Court, and ordering her to give security that she will not leave the State during the pendency of this suit. She is also to show cause why the injunction should not be perpetual.

Rev. J. G. Oncken.—If we except Dr. Judson, (says the Christian Watchman and Reflector,) no missionary has visited our shores in whom a greater and deeper interest is felt than in Mr. Oncken. His whole history is suited to give him a large place in the regards of his brethren. His presence at the anniversary of the American Tract Society, and his remarks, made this occasion one of enduring memories. At Albany he excited a similar feeling to even a greater degree, as will be seen in the following, which we find in a letter of Mr. Beebee to the Baptist Register:

"The presence of Mr. Oncken, the well-known laborer among the people of Germany, enhanced in no inconsiderable degree the interest of the meeting. No missionary from a foreign land was ever greeted with more cordiality than this beloved brother. He speaks English with great ease and accuracy. His countenance is prepossessing and expressive, his hair a little dashed with gray, his stature rather below ordinary, and his age perhaps in the vicinity of fifty. Br. O., it was said, would remain in the country some six months and attend the meetings of our different public bodies. He is still suffering from the dreadful calamity at Norwalk; but was able to address us for an hour, with much force and eloquence, on the subject of the origin and progress of the cause of Christ in Germany, and the prosperity which the Lord had vouchsafed to him and his associates amidst the trials and persecutions to which they have been subjected, it was animating to listen to. All parts of Germany seem to have been visited by their colporteurs, and evangelical tracts and Bibles have been liberally distributed. Mr. O. produced a powerful sensation throughout the vast congregation, and brought out generous expressions."

Buildings for Benevolent Societies.—The leading benevolent Societies of the country seem to be growing in a conviction of the importance of owning buildings in which to transact their business. Within a year past, the American Bible Society has taken possession of an immense building erected for its use in Astor Place, New York; the American and Foreign Bible Society has purchased and entered premises in Nassau-st., New York; the Baptist Home Mission Society has appointed a Committee to provide quarters for its use; and in Philadelphia, last week, a meeting was held, and ten thousand dollars subscribed, to secure a capacious edifice in that city for the use of the American Sunday-School Union. These societies have all had experience of the effects of renting, and have become satisfied that they need local habitations as well as names. There is no better way to insure their permanence; and if now we had money to invest for the benefit of such societies, we should feel more satisfaction in investing it so as to furnish them with permanent places of business, and fixtures to operate with, than in any other way.

New York Legislature.—This body has been in session at Albany for some two weeks past. We have endeavored (but thus far in vain) to find in the report of its proceedings something worth recording. Last week an invitation was sent in by the newly-consolidated Central Line of Railroads, for the legislators to take an excursion to Niagara Falls and spend Sunday, which was accepted. While this matter was under discussion, a company of canal-boat owners—supposing, probably, that the legislators would feel an interest in the State works—sent them an invitation to take an excursion to Buffalo on the Canal, which was not accepted. An invitation was also sent them to ride over the line of the New York and Erie Railroad.

Annual Meeting of the N. Y. State Temperance Society.—The Sixth Annual Meeting (since its re-organization) of the New York State Temperance Society will be held at Rochester, on Thursday the 16th day of June, at 10 o'clock A. M., to continue in session two days.

The present aspect of the cause demands a full attendance of this annual gathering of its friends, and it is hoped that every portion of the State will be represented by men who are alive to the interests of the Society and the great reform which it represents.

Auxiliary Societies, Sons of Temperance, Rechabites, &c., are cordially invited to send delegates, and where no such associations exist, let our friends come self-delegated, prepared to counsel and to act as the necessities of the enterprise may demand. It is expected that business of importance will occupy the attention of the Convention. The evening sessions will probably be devoted to public addresses, and eminent speakers will be secured for the occasion.

HERON CAMP, President.
Wm. H. Burleigh, Cor. Secretary.

Methodist Theological Seminaries.—The Western Christian Advocate shows the necessity of theological seminaries, from the change which has taken place in the policy of Methodism:—

"As our circuits are now nearly annihilated, and young men are at once placed in charge, the old school is nearly broken up. Our missionaries to the heathen require especial preparation in their case; while the demands of the age are neither few nor small for increased ministerial attainments. The technical theological school, as it exists in most other churches, does not suit the genius of Methodism. But a Biblical course, comprising systematic theology, ecclesiastical history, and church polity, of a practical as well as scientific type, is demanded by the wants of the church and of the world."

Revival at Westerly, R. I.—The Christian Watchman and Reflector says that the First Baptist church in Westerly, R. I., under the pastoral care of Rev. F. Denison, have been, for the last two months, enjoying a very pleasant revival. Twenty-six have already been baptized, and others are in readiness. The work has been quiet, deep and steady. The pastor has had no ministerial assistance, as there has been but little extra preaching. It is the Lord's work. The efficient means have been faith, prayer, and personal effort.

Loss of the Ship William and Mary.

The one hundred and eighty passengers of the recently-wrecked ship William and Mary, who were reported by the captain to have gone down with the ship, are safe and sound at Nassau. The following account of the maner in which they were saved, is copied from the Bahama Herald of May 18th. Had the captain been any thing else than a coward, the ship itself would probably have been saved:—

"The American ship William and Mary, of Bath, Maine, Stinson, master, from Liverpool for New Orleans, with a cargo of railroad iron, pig iron, dry goods, and crockery, and 180 emigrant passengers, struck on a small rock, (nine feet under water,) near the Great Isaacs, on Tuesday evening, May 5, at 20 minutes past 8 o'clock. The ship was ashore about three hours. Three of the crew, who have arrived at this port, state that after the ship struck they let go one anchor, parted the chain, and then let go the other anchor. The boats were got out, two of which were stove. At 6 A. M., the captain, with the mates and a part of the crew, left in one of the boats, and four seamen, and passengers filling the long boat, also left. Two passengers in endeavoring to get in the long boat, were drowned. Two seamen, William Ward and Samuel D. Harris, refused to quit the ship and abandon the helpless and unfortunate passengers. Discerning the land about eight miles ahead, they slipped the chain and tried to get the ship under way, in order, if possible, to reach the land and run the ship ashore; but the passengers could render but little assistance in working the ship, and they were therefore unable to do so. Had not the captain and crew deserted the ship, it is the conviction of the seamen referred to, that the ship might have been run ashore. Being unable to manage her for the want of proper assistance, she drifted to the N. E., the passengers exerting themselves to the utmost at the pumps. During the evening, rafts were constructed from spars, &c., but were not launched until the following morning. Early on the morning of the 7th the land was green about ten miles distant, and soon after a schooner hove in sight. The colors were set at half mast, when the schooner immediately bore down to the ship. The passengers redoubled their exertions at the pumps, and were soon relieved by the wrecking schooner Oracle, Robert Sands, master, coming alongside to their assistance. The women and children were first taken off and landed—and afterward the schooner returned and saved the remainder of the passengers, two men being on deck when the ship went down, (on Friday,) but saved themselves by jumping into the wrecking schooner's boat."

Steamboat Disaster.—The Quebec Morning Chronicle of the 30th ult. gives the following chapter of calamities which occurred in that place on the 29th ult.:—

"At 3½ o'clock there was a rush of wind, which whirled the dust into the air, covered the surface of the St. Lawrence in spray, and lashed the water into foam. The wind being westerly, the vessels off the Point Levi shore had great difficulty in keeping their anchors. Boats and timber which had broken away from the coves, were to be seen adrift, and the bark Norder foundered at her moorings at Tibbit's Cove. The ship sank about 4¼ o'clock. It is rumored, also, that a boat with six persons on board was capsized during the gale, and that all perished.

"About the same time an awful catastrophe occurred at Gilmour's Cove. The steamer St. Pierre, one of the ferry boats, sometimes employed in towing, having put on board of the steamer for Montreal from a vessel in the stream, upwards of 290 passengers, proceeded to Gilmour's Cove to take a barge in tow, and while preparing to do so her boiler burst, and out of ten persons who were on board, eight perished. Capt. Barras, who stood over the boiler, was blown high into the air; Mr. Terrien had his skull split open by a piece of the boiler, and his wife and two children who stood by him were killed, but their bodies were hardly at all disfigured. The other sufferers were firemen and deck-hands, whose names we have not ascertained.

Ole Bull's Colony.—A letter to the N. Y. Tribune, dated Oleona, Potter Co., Pa., May 24, says:—

Great preparations are making here, by Ole Bull personally and his followers, to celebrate the coming Fourth of July on a magnificent scale. On that occasion he expects a large number of his musical brethren to assist in the ceremony. He is fitting up a grand concert room, 100 feet in length and 30 feet wide, which will be one of the upper rooms of his own dwelling. His Colony seems to be progressing very rapidly for a new country. Ole Bull is certainly an extraordinary man. You can see him up at daylight in the morning, mounted on his famous Norwegian horse, riding around, examining his lands. After his breakfast you will find him assisting the mechanics in their operations, raising buildings, &c. After dinner he may be found working on the roads with quite a number of hands. The schools of the Colony are flourishing under the care and instruction of a number of teachers from New England. These schools he visits daily. When he executes a deed for land to his countrymen, he inserts a clause depriving them of the privilege of selling liquors, except as medicine.

A Black List.—The Philadelphia Christian Chronicle, of the 27th ult., publishes what is termed a Black List, which means a list of the names of certain subscribers who are several years in arrears for their papers. The list contains seventeen names, the aggregate amount of whose indebtedness is upwards of two hundred dollars. It is an easy matter for a man to let his subscription run on a few years, notwithstanding he may be abundantly able to pay it at any time. Such persons do not consider the actual injury they are inflicting on a publisher. Each one may reason with himself, that his indebtedness is but a trifle, even if it has run three or four years; but when a hundred such bills are added together they amount to a large sum. The seventeen delinquent subscribers noticed above, owe the Chronicle upwards of two hundred dollars, quite a snug little sum—too much altogether for the publisher to lose, whose own liabilities must be met or his business must be stopped. [Christian Secretary.

Illinois Central Railroad.—The State of Illinois is approaching the fruition of her hopes in the completion of her great Railroad. It will be remembered, that when the 2,600,000 acres of land donated by the Federal Government to the State were made over to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, it was one of the conditions, that 50 miles of the Central Road should be put in operation within two years. The Company deposited with the State Treasurer $200,000 in specie as a guarentee of their good faith. This sum was to be returned on the completion of the 50 miles, when the right of the Company to proceed and sell its lands would become active. On the 23d of May last, the trains ran from Bloomington to La Salle, 60 miles, making all the way stoppages. Pursuant to the contract with the Company, the State Treasurer repaid the $200,000 into the hands of Mr. Burrell, the treasurer of the Company.

Central New York Railroad.—The new railroad arrangements for the West, via the Central Line, will go into operation on the 13th inst. There will be five express trains from Albany every day, at 6½, 7½ and 10½ A. M., and 6 and 11 P. M. Passengers leave New York at 6 A. M., Albany at 10½, and reach Niagara Falls or Buffalo at 7½ P. M., in 13½ hours from New York, and 9 hours from Albany. More than half an hour is consumed in crossing the river at Albany, and another half hour for dinner. Arrangements will soon be made to run connected trains from New York to Cincinnati in 30 hours, The Central Line do their 327 miles in 9 hours with ease and safety. There are double tracks or parallel roads the entire distance, so that meeting trains is impossible.

Insanity in Ohio.—The Lunatic Asylum at Columbus, Ohio, is now full, containing upwards of five hundred patients. In fourteen years there have been admitted 1,116 patients, of which 1,038 were discharged recovered. Of the number admitted, 505 were farmers, being more than twelve times the number of those of any other occupation, except laborers, of which class there were 160. The next highest on the list is teachers, being 40. There were 24 clerks, 22 preachers, 21 tailors, 9 lawyers, 6 printers, 3 sea captains, 2 musicians, 2 medical students, &c. Among the causes, spirit rapping is now the most frequent.

British Bible Society.—The annual meeting of the British and Foriegn Bible Society was held on the 4th of May. Bishop McIlvaine and Dr. Vermilye appeared as delegates of the American Bible Society. The attendance of clergymen was the largest ever known. Speeches were made by the Marquis of Cholmondely, Baptist Noel, Bishop McIlvaine, Rev. Hugh McNeil, Thomas Binney, and others. The receipts, exclusive of the Jubilee Fund, were £109,160, of which £54,572 was for books. The issues of books were 1,168,794; Jubilee Fund above £17,000.

Slave Stampedes.—The Alton (Ill.) Telegraph says that slaves are running away from Missouri, at the present time, in battalions. Three belonging to Mr. R. Meek, of Weston, ran away on Wednesday of last week—two of whom were afterward apprehended. They were making for the Plains. Fifteen made a stampede from Ray County, the week before, and took the line of their march for Iowa. Several were captured in Grundy County, but the larger number made good their escape. It would be a glorious thing for Missouri, if all her slaves should take it in their heads to run away. If she only knew it, they are one of the greatest drawbacks to her advancement and prosperity.

SUMMARY.

Mr. Godfrey M. Frankenstein is about completing a very extensive and accurate Panorama of Niagara Falls. Hunt's Merchants' Magazine says that the sketches from which this Panorama is painted, Mr. Frankenstein has been making at different times since 1844. This enables him to present this great masterpiece of nature under the various changes of nine years. There are over one hundred and sixty-three paintings, of which one hundred and eight are finished oil paintings, and were, with five or six unavoidable exceptions, painted on the spot. They were taken during all the seasons of the year, and all hours of the day and night.

From the Pittsburg Advocate we learn that the Rev. John Whippo, a member of the Erie Conference, died at Youngstown, Ohio, on the 5th ult. He was inhaling chloroform preparatory to a surgical operation on the face for "tic doloureux." After a few inspirations he exclaimed, "I am gone!" "You are not gone," replied his physician, as he proceeded to administer more chloroform. Mr. Whippo's countenance then suddenly changed, he straightened himself out in his chair, and was a corpse in fifteen minutes.

The grading and bridging of the Sunbury and Erie Railroad has been all put under contract, and this great work will be immediately carried forward to completion. This Road is a very important one, as, in connection with the Cattawissa and Williamsport, it opens another great route to the West, and one which promises to divide the East and West traffic with the other routes. By the Jersey Central it also gives New York a new connection with the West, and brings a large district of country into railroad connection with New York, which has now no railroad facilities.

A small matter, but one of value to farmers, is contained in the following: If you wish to drive a cut nail into seasoned oak timber, and not have it break or bend, just have a small quantity of oil near by, and dip the nail before driving, and it will never fail to go. In mending carts and plows this is of great advantage, for they are most generally made of oak wood. In straightening old nails before using, let it be done on wood, and with easy blows. If done on iron they will be sure to break.

A dispatch dated Chicago, Ill., Thursday, June 1, 1853, says, The steamtug Eclipse burst her boiler in this port yesterday. The explosion was terrific, tearing the boat entirely to pieces, killing a fireman and boy, and severely injuring the engineer, cook, wheelman, and one deck hand. The Captain was also slightly injured. The boilers were new, and the boat, which was owned by E. R. Blackwell, of Buffalo, and Capt. S. M. Johnson, of Chicago, was valued at $10,000. The engineer's life is despaired of; he was dragged out of the engine-room after the explosion, terribly scalded.

A French company, of ample means, have purchased a tract of land at a short distance east of the Crystal Lake, near New Rochelle, N. Y., where they have commenced the erection of a magnificent establishment for carrying on the manufacture of Bohemian Glass Ware. The Westchester News states that the buildings will be of brick and stone, and put up in the most substantial manner. The principal building, fronting the turnpike road, will be upward of 300 feet long, and four or five stories high; while in the rear there will be several other buildings of smaller dimensions, adapted to the wants of the various branches of the business. One furnace alone will occupy a space of fifty feet square.

In the Official Announcement of the opening of the "Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations" in this City, the 15th of July is the day named. The Directors state that they believe the Building and the Exhibition will fully meet the just expectations of the public. In order to give ample scope for inventive skill in machinery, they have materially enlarged the area of the Palace, by adding wings to the extent of nearly a fourth of the ground-room of the main edifice. They had hoped to open the Exhibition much earlier, and alledge as the chief cause of delay, the novelty and intricacy of the style of construction, and the high standard of architectural beauty at which they have aimed.

The Supreme Court have recently made a decision, which goes to settle certain questions connected with the subject of Michigan tax titles. The Court held that the deed, in the usual form, from the Auditor-General, is in substantial compliance with the law, and is good; that the law making it prima facia evidence of title is a valid law, and the burden of proof of irregularity is on the party seeking to avoid the tax title. The Court held further, that the form of the certificate is immaterial, and on the last point the case went off.

The last novelty in the way of business is the proffer of Messrs. Rafferty & Leask, Hatters, No. 57 Chatham-st., to give each purchaser a Daguerreotype of himself neatly inserted in the centre of the crown of his new head-gear, there to remain till the hat itself wears out. They propose to sell these Daguerreotype Hats just as cheap as any Hats are or can be sold, calculating that the moderate expense of the pictures will be made up to them by the increase of their sales.

The Milwaukie Daily Sentinel says: A monster hog, weighing eleven hundred and nine pounds, was lately shipped on board the steamer Arctic, on his way to the World's Fair at New York. He was purchased by Messrs. R. Bugg & R. R. Stewart, of Niagara County, N. Y., for $200, from Mr. Hollister B. Thayer, of Troy, Walworth County, Wis. His actual measurement was as follows: Girth behind the shoulders, 6 feet 7 inches; extreme length, 6 feet 11 inches. He was perfectly white, and only twenty months old.

A dispatch dated Charleston, Tuesday, May 31, 1853, says: The night express train on the South Carolina Railroad got off the track on Monday, 55 miles from this City, in consequence of a bar of flange iron being maliciously placed on the rails. Isaac Winters, of Penn., the Engineer, and Samuel Willit, fireman, were killed; W. F. Smead, fireman, dangerously scalded, and his life is despaired of. Four freight cars were smashed.

The Pacific Railroad Company has completed a road for 50 miles west of St. Louis, and it is under contract for 135 miles. Its length is to be 600 miles to the boundary of the State. The point where the road intersects the Kansas River, is the point at which Mr. Edward Beale is to take his departure on the survey of the Benton and Fremont route for a railroad to the Pacific.

Coal was recently said to have been discovered in Castleton, Vt., but it proved only Slate, impregnated with sulphur or bitumen, so as to burn a while and leave nearly all the fuel behind, with a considerable smell extra. In and near Castleton are the finest Slate quarries in this country.

The cottage of Mr. Preston Lincoln, near Wallingford Depot, Ct., was recently destroyed by fire, and, sad to relate, a little daughter of Mr. L., four years of age, perished in the flames. A little son was badly burned, but will probably survive. Mrs. L. had gone out to work, and left the two children in the house alone.

The Cincinnati express train, on the New York and Erie Railroad, ran from Hornellsville to Susquehanna, a distance of 145 miles, in 161 minutes! The Binghamton Republican believes this to be the greatest speed which has ever been attained, for so great a distance, on any road in the United States.

The people of color in Illinois have just issued an appeal, through the "Wood River Baptist Association," for aid in procuring the means of educating their children. The plan is to raise $500 to aid in supporting schools. Rev. R. J. Robinson, of Alton, is the agent for the business.

Mary Edmundson, the elder of two quadroon sisters redeemed from a life of infamy and horror by the free-will offerings of our citizens, and since receiving an education at Oberlin as a beneficiary of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, died a few days since, aged some 22 or 23 years.

The Catholic Bishop of Montreal annouces that he will not go to Europe this summer as he had purposed, but will visit every part of his Diocese instead, and, having just succeeded in eradicating Drunkenness among his flock, will next undertake a like eradication of Profanity.

Mr. P. P. Stewart, of Troy, the inventor of the superior cooking stove that bears his name, has established a Water Cure Hospital, into which he has introduced some quite original and very rational manipulations of his own invention, for muscular exercise of the vital organs.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Titsworths & Dunn, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.
WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.
An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.
Transit Instruments, Levels, Surveyors' Compasses; Improved Compasses for taking horizontal and vertical angles without the needle.

Miscellaneous.

From Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Breeze of Spring.

Dull winter hastens to be gone,
He's disappearing fast;
The sunny hours are coming on,
The stormy time is past.
The ice no longer binds the rill,
Nor snows their mantle fling;
For every bleak and barren hill
Has kissed the breeze of spring.

I hear its music in the wood;
It sighs along the vale,
Where summer flowers in beauty stood,
It lingers in the dale;
It plays upon the primrose banks,
And rests its merry wing;
The drooping snow-drop kindly thanks
The western breeze of spring.

Ah! well it knows where violets grow
In the lone and shady lane;
It bids its sweet, blue fav'rites blow,
And onward speeds again.
It wakes the flowers of the field,
And they their offerings bring;
The flowers their sweetest incense yield,
To scent the breeze of spring.

The blackbird, from the hawthorn bush,
Renews his lively strain;
On topmost branches stands the thrush,
And tunes his throat amain;
At close of evening, calm and mild,
He makes the forest ring
With native wood notes, clear and wild—
He loves the breeze of spring.

The robin leaves his winter friends
For hedge-rows far away—
Above his mossy nest he bends,
And pipes his plaintive lay,
The lark, uprising with the light,
On merry mountain wing—
Strains all his might till out of sight,
And hails the breeze of spring.

A hundred voices fill the air,
The sun shines warmly down;
Away with each intruding care,
And leave the gloomy town.
Come, roam along the woodpath green,
Hear nature's favorites sing,
Enjoy the soul-enlivening scene,
And woo the breeze of spring.

Increasing the Wool-Clip.

The Agricultor translates the following paragraph from the Chronique Agricole (French.) It is rather hard to swallow:—

"About two years since a farmer named Virel, residing in the Canton of Chatelet, had one of his sheep seriously torn and injured by a dog. Although he had but little hopes of saving the animal's life, he decided on dressing its wounds, which he did with some fatty substance, mixed with the juice of certain plants. The animal soon recovered; and in about two months after, the farmer remarked that the wool on the parts which he had rubbed with his preparation was much finer and longer than elsewhere. Determined to try a further experiment, he last year pulled off all the wool from the bodies of six of his sheep, and rubbed them with the preparation for three days following, and then turned them out with the others. At the end of August they were shorn, when they produced a much larger weight of wool than ordinary, and of a very superior quality. It is needless to say, that he afterward extended his experiment to a greater number, and a few days since he proceeded to what he calls his spring shearing, when each of the animals yielded about five pounds of very superior wool. He calculates that by the aid of his process, he will be able to have two shearings a year, spring and autumn. The grease he uses is said to be only mutton fat, but the herbs employed are a secret. However, the paper from which we translate intimates that the principal plants used are Sempervivum Tectorum and Chalidonium Majus, which are well known to be valuable curatives.

Ancient Babylon—Its Ruins.

From the Literary Gazette.

It may be known to many of our readers, that the French government has employed a party of gentlemen to explore the site of ancient Babylon. From reports just received from them, it appears that they have ascertained, beyond reasonable doubt, that the ruins beneath a tumulus called the Kasr, are those of the marvelous palace-citadel of Semiramis and Nebuchadnezzar. They are in such a state of confusion and decay, that it is impossible to form from them any idea of the extent or character of the edifice. They appear, however, to extend beneath the bed of the Euphrates, a circumstance accounted for by the change in the course of that river. In them have been found sarcophagi of clumsy execution and strange form, and so small, that the bodies of the dead must have been packed up in them, the chin touching the knees, and the arms being pressed on the breast by the legs. These sarcophagi have every appearance of having been used for the lowest class of society; but notwithstanding the place in which they were found, the discoverers are inclined to think that they are of Parthian, not Chaldean origin. There have also been found numerous fragments of enameled bricks, containing portions of the figures of men and animals, together with cuneiform inscriptions, the latter white in color on a blue ground. According to M. Eresnel, the chief of the expedition, these bricks afford a strong proof that the ruins are those of the palace of Nebuchadnezzar, inasmuch as the ornaments on them appear to be sporting subjects, such as are described by Ctesias and Diodorus. The foundations having been dug down to in certain parts, it has been ascertained that they are formed of bricks about a foot square united by strong cement, and that they are in blocks, as if they had been snapped in all directions. In a tumulus called Amram, to the south of Kasr, interesting discoveries have been made. They appear to be the ruins of the dependencies of the palace situated on the left bank of the Euphrates; and they contain numerous sarcophagi, in which were found skeletons clothed in a sort of armor, and wearing crowns of gold on their heads. When touched, the skeletons, with the exception of some parts of the skulls, fell into dust; but the iron, though rusty, and the gold of the crowns, are in a fair state of preservation. M. Fresuel thinks that the dead in the sarcophagi were some of the soldiers of Alexander or Seleucus. The crowns are simple bands, with three leaves in the shape of laurel on one side, and three on the other. The leaves are very neatly executed. Beneath the bands are leaves of gold, which it is supposed covered the eyes. From the quantity of iron found in some of the coffins, it appears that the bodies are entirely enveloped in it; and in one there is no iron but some ear-rings, a proof that it was occupied by a female. The sarcophagi are about two and three-qaurter yards in length by between half and three-quarters of a yard wide, and are entirely formed of bricks and united by mortar. In addition to all this, a tomb, containing statuettes in marble or alabaster of Juno, Venus, and of a reclining figure wearing a Phrygian cap, together with some rings, ear-rings, and other articles of jewelry, has been found, as have also numerous statuettes, vases, phials, articles of pottery, black stones, &c., of Greek, Persian, or Chaldean workmanship.

Take Care of your Old Orchards.

It will pay, if the thing is rightly done. I have had some experience in the business on my own premises, and feel well satisfied with the result. A good apple tree, or rather a tree that produces good fruit, takes up no more room than a tree that is worthless. There is an old apple tree standing in the corner of my door-yard, which, eight years ago, I considered the same as worthless, (producing fruit that was scarcely worth the picking,) which now produces as fine Greenings as any in the market, and it has done so for four years past. The tree is large, the body being about three feet in circumference. The first year that I commenced operations upon it, I inserted nearly one hundred scions, the majority of which lived; the next year cut off the remaining branches, and put in about half as many more. The grafts lived so well, I was obliged to cut off a considerable number; and I now have a wide spreading top, in a thrifty condition.

The fact has been clearly proved to my mind, that it is as good economy to expend money in improving old orchards, as it is to grow young trees. To substantiate this statement, I will briefly mention what I am personally knowing to. Some ten years since, I was called upon by a neighbor of mine to go and set a few scions in some old trees, that bore a poor quality of fruit. He said his object was to see if there was any thing to be done to improve his old orchard. The first year I grafted some two or three trees, around which the owner spaded up the soil to the distance of ten or twelve feet each way, applied a good dressing of manure, and planted the same to potatoes. The next year he called on me to graft a few more trees; the first grafted looked so promising he would experiment a little more. This year some ten or twelve trees were grafted, and treated around the root in the same way. Thus he has continued to do from year to year—and now has the gratification of witnessing his old trees transformed into a thrifty, growing orchard. Last fall handsome grafted fruit was gathered from this "old orchard" sufficient to pay all expenses.

What has been done may be done, and it would be good economy for farmers to "try the experiment;" give one or two trees a fair trial this year, and wait the result. As Poor Richard says—"A penny saved is worth twopence earned." [Rural New Yorker.

Temperance on the Hudson River Railroad.

The following document was issued from the office of the Superintendent of the Hudson River Railroad, under date of May 10, 1853. It was adopted by the Board more than a year before, and its strict enforcement probally explains why that road is the scene of so few accidents:—

"The use of ardent spirits on this Road, or about the premises or shops of the Company, except for mechanical purposes, is strictly forbidden. No one will be employed, or continued in employment, who is known to be in the habit of drinking ardent spirits."

The attention of all is called to the above Regulation, and all infractions of it must be promptly reported to the Superintendent.

The Master Machinist, Foremen of Shop, and Inspector of Engines, Train Master, Road Masters, Track Masters and Conductors, will be held strictly responsible for the enforcement of the following directions:

The Inspector of Engines and Foremen of the Shops must not allow any engine to go out on the tracks of this Road at any time, or for any purpose, when the Engineman, Fireman, or any other person connected with the engine, are in any way under the influence of ardent spirits, or intoxicating drinks.

The Conductors must not allow any person connected with their trains, who are in any way under the influence of ardent spirits or intoxicating drinks, to accompany or have any authority on the train.

The Road Masters and Track Masters must in no case allow any Draw-Bridge Tender, Signalman, Switchman or Flagman, to perform these duties at any times when they are under the influence of ardent spirits.

The Train Master must not in any case permit any Conductor, or any other person connected with a train, to go with the same or exert any authority thereon, when they are under the influence of ardent spirits.

Such measures must be taken as will ensure the strict execution of these directions, and authority is given to suspend from pay and employment all such as violate them in any way.

The New York Shad Fisheries.

The "last run of shad" being over, the fishermen are taking up the poles. It has been a good fishing season. There have not been as many fish caught as in some years past, but the good price which they have commanded in the market, has made the business fully as remunerative. This shad-fishing has become an extensive business, and the facilities of railroads, together with the convenience of Rockland Ice, has extended the market for shad all through the country, thereby increasing the demand and value. They are sent west packed in ice, as far as Cincinnati and Chicago, in 48 hours by railroad. They are also sold about the country in wagons, supplies being had at the fisheries, steamboat landings, and railroad depots. The fisheries extend from outside of the Narrows up the Hudson River as far as Tappan Bay, twenty miles above Bull's Ferry. There are some caught at Newburgh, and further up the river. These fisheries have about 75 different owners—each owner having from one to ten rows. A row includes about thirty poles and nets. The poles are from forty to one hundred feet long. There are in the distance named about two hundred rows. Each row costs, for poles, nets and one boat, about $350. Each row requires the attendance of three or four men. Shad-fishing usually begins from the 25th of March to the 1st of April, and ends not far from the 1st of June, but these fish are often caught as early as St. Patrick's day, (17th March.) In years of scarcity they have commanded a very high price. In seasons of great plenty they have sold as low as $9 per 100. This year the usual price has been about $25 per 100. Many of the fishermen live in Jersey City, others in Shrewsbury, Wehawken, and within a few miles of the shore the whole extent of the fisheries. The men employed receive, for experienced men, from $35 to $40 per month, and new hands get from $20 to $25 per month. The nets used are eighty meshes, or about 20 feet square. They are sunk about 18 feet below the level of the water. Lifting the nets takes place at high tide, twice in 24 hours, whether day or night, rain or shine. The boats with the fish are usually taken directly from the rows to the markets. The hauls vary—each net having from 5 to 50 fish. A row usually yields from 4,000 to 5,000 shad during the season.

The fishermen say that the best run of shad is at the same time that peach trees are in blossom. These fisheries are considered the right and property of the owners, and those rights are respected. When they change hands, it is with the purchase of the boats, poles and nets, belonging thereto. In the shallow water of the bay, toward Communipaw, fishing is done by fykes. These are made by sticking hedges of brush under water, in such a manner that the fish run into the nets. About half as many men are employed at fishing with fykes, as with poles, and about half as many fish are caught in that manner as with poles. There are altogether over 1,000 men employed in fishing. The capital invested is not far from $10,000; and the proceeds of the business during the season just closed is estimated at $300,000. [Tribune.

The Dahlia.

We do not know of one single gem in Flora's diadem more exquisitely beautiful than the Dahlia; and there is nothing easier of culture and propagation, and nothing that continues longer in bloom. The wonder is, that it is not more generally cultivated at the South. Our dahlias, this season, commenced blooming in April, and they have been one dense mass of bloom ever since, with a prospect of continuing so until frost. The forms range from the exquisite double cup, to the open petal. Some are singularly unique and beautiful; for instance, a deep crimson, with a single white petal, scarlet and white, yellow and red, variegated, and all the thousand fancy forms and colors which Flora, in her wildest, gayest freaks, could possibly assume. The dahlia thrives and blooms best in a sandy soil—too rich a soil making it too bushy. Where the soil is naturally rich, a shovelful of sand put around the tubers will be of great service; and when it is naturally poor, a shovelful of well-rotted manure will be the same. But the dahlia loves water, and when the season its not reasonably wet, it must have artifical watering. We commend its culture to all lovers of the beautiful.

Many who cultivate the dahlia are not aware of the ease with which the plant may be obtained from the seeds. These may be gathered in sufficient quantities at the season of the year from almost any plant which has blossomed freely during the summer. If sown in the spring, in a rich, warm soil, with a southern exposure, they will, without any extra care, produce plants which will blossom abundantly during the same season. The practice of keeping the tubers through the winter is quite unnecessary, except for the preservation of choice varieties. Those obtained from the seed will commence blossoming somewhat later in the season than the others, but early enough to mature seed, while the varieties which can be thus secured are almost endless. Captain Ringgold's Exploring Expedition.

This expedition, which has occupied public attention for the last year, left New York a few days since for its scene of operations. It consists of five vessels, including a steamer of 800 tuns, all of which are under the command of Capt. Cadwalader Ringgold, a naval officer of great energy and perseverance, and one who distinguished himself while Commander of the Porpoise in the Exploring Expedition of Captain Wilkes.

No exploring or surveying expedition has ever left our shores, destined to so interesting and so wide a field of labor; to a field so little known, and one to the results of which, commerce alike with science, will look forward with anxiety and a deep felt interest. Many imagine this to be the long-talked-of Japan expedition, with which it has no connection. The latter has a distinct object in view, that of making a commercial treaty with Japan, as well as to compel the Japanese to afford protection to the shipwrecked American seamen, thrown upon her shores.

Ringgold's expedition is for the purpose of exploring and surveying the shores of the Northern Pacific, and the Islands embraced therein. This will include the north eastern shores of Asia, north of Japan, including the Kurile Islands, the Gulf of Tartary, the Sea of Okotsk, the Peninsula of Kamschatka, the Sea of Anadar, and the coast thence to Behring's straits. On the opposite American shore it will trace the coast from the British possessions to the same straits. The Aleutian chain of islands, which extend nearly from one continent to the other, will also be examined. Finally, an exploration of the Arctic Sea within Behring's Straits will be made; not so much with a view of discovery, as to survey those unknown waters, which have recently become a place of resort for our whalemen. At the present time we know of no American or other commerce in these northern seas, except by our whale ships, and an occasional Russian vessel to the town of Sitka, the principal port of Russian America.

In former times, extensive explorations were made in these seas, but they were rather for discovery than for the extension of commerce. As early as 1741, the Russian navigator Behring made an exploration of Northern Pacific, when he discovered the Straits which bear his name. In 1799, Captain Cooke made a visit to these seas, after the great discoveries which have made his name so famous; and in 1804, another Russian navigator, Krusenstern, cruised in them, touching at various points along the coast. Many other voyages were made of minor interest, none of which seem to have had any other object in view than the discovery of new lands. Commerce does not even appear to have been a secondary object. Here is, indeed, a broad and untrodden field; and, as Captain Ringgold takes with him a corps of naturalists and other scientific men, with all the necessary preparations for a most thorough exploration, and a full outfit of the best instruments, the learned world will look forward with much interest for a prosperous voyage and safe return to our shores of this important expedition.

If our Government had no other object in view than to seek new fields for our numerous fleet now engaged in whaling, which is by far the largest in the world, it would be fully justified in the equipment of so large and well organized an expedition. But its objects are broader, having in view the extension of our commerce in the seas referred to, and of making known to our seamen the coasts they will ere long be navigating.

Washing Sheep.

This is a branch of sheep economy which is wholly indispensable. The careless and slovenly manner with which it is performed by the great majority of American wool growers, calls for severe reprehension; the evil consequences resulting from it, however, are inflicted mostly upon themselves.

The most suitable time depends upon the latitude and season; the latter causing sometimes, in the same locality, a considerable variation. At all events, the flock-master must be sure of one thing, namely, that the water and weather are comparatively warm. The violation of this is very common, which is exceedingly cruel and inhuman, and often exposes sheep to disease.

The day selected should be one of sunshine, if possible; and as this work in the Northern and Middle States is commonly attended to from the 10th to the 25th of May, it will rarely be the case at that season, that the water will be of the right temperature before nine or ten o'clock in the morning; and when only a few sheep are to be washed, it will be better generally to delay it until the afternoon.

If the washing can be conducted immediately after a warm rain, it will be easier, the effect of it being to soften and loosen the dirt; in this event the yearlings should be selected first, as they are generally the filthiest.

The flock-master should always be present; and if he does not possess the physical ability or inclination to "bear a hand," he should at least see that every thing goes oft properly, and is conducted on "temperance principles," for rum has done its full share of mischief on such occasions. He should be provided with a pair of shears, and if any dung-locks are seen, they should be taken off before the sheep are put into the water.

Where there is a running stream of pure water, with a gravelly or stony bottom, no better mode can be adopted for wool cleasing, and none other is so economical.

As to eradicating all the dirt from the external surface of wool when upon the sheep, it is not expected, for it is impossible to accomplish it; and therefore it must necessarily be left to the cleansing process of the manufacturer. But that much more can be extracted than is usual, cannot admit of a doubt; and if a general trial will only be made, those who undertake it will be sure to succeed, and rewarded, not only with the grateful thanks of manufacturers, but a handsome advance upon the prices of their wool. Bucks, especially of the Merino breed, require an extra time to wash them, and if a little soft soap should be used, their fleeces will not lose any thing in value in the estimation of the manufacturer.

After the washing is completed, the sheep should be turned upon a thick-covered sward, that no dirt may collect on the fleeces, before they are shorn. Driving them along a dusty road must be avoided, if possible, when returning from the washing.

The Spanish custom is to cleanse the fleece with soap, after it is shorn, the grease or yolk abounding to such a degree, with its concomitant dirt, as to preclude the possibility of cleansing it properly in the ordinary way.

In England, the breeds having less of gum than others, washing is comparatively easy, and, where practicable, is done by swimming the sheep to and fro in a pond or stream, and gently squeezing the wool with the hands.

The washing of Saxony sheep, in Germany and other parts of the Continent, conforms to the better modes adopted in this country, but is performed with far greater nicety and care. [Morrell.

New Engine

Mr. J. S. Gustin, of Trenton, N. J., has recently completed an electro-magnetic engine of about one horse power. It has been built for the True American office in Trenton, and the inventor is very certain that he has power enough in his engine to drive the press (a Napier single cylinder) of that office. Accurate experiments as to its efficiency and economy have not yet been made. Yet the inventor, after years of experiment, and the building of two engines on similar principles, is very sanguine that he as well as Ericsson has got the upper hand with steam. The engine is very simple. Cylinders of coiled wire, properly insulated, with solid iron plungers (of course these become electro magnets) attached to the arms of a working beam. The stroke or distance traversed by the plungers is about two inches. The crank is about three inches, the fly wheel weighs about 100 pounds. The working beam is an unequal lever, centered between the cylinders, with its longer arm toward the crank—thus permitting a two inch stroke to drive a three inch crank.

The novelty of Mr. Gustin's invention lies chiefly in the use of powerful "maintaining springs," which receive the tremendous blow which an electro-magnet compels its keeper to give when at close quarters, and thus hold the dynamic effect in store against the time when the magnet and the keeper are separate an inch or more, and consequently powerless. In this device Mr. G. is justly protected by a patent. [Independent.

St. Louis Removing to the Country.—Much apprehension has long been felt in St. Louis, that the action of the waters of the Missouri, where they enter the Mississippi above that city, will eventually wear away the Illinois shore to such an extent as to force a new channel for the great father of waters, and thus leave St. Louis some five or six miles out in the country. The late flood, as usual, tore away the bank, having washed off a mile and a half of the telegraph line near Alton, with all the land on which the poles were planted. The editor of The Alton Courier says:—"As much abrasion of the Illinois shore for the next ten years, as has been occurring for a few years past, and the lakes and the lowlands above spoken of will be reached. The Gillham farm is now nearly all swept away, and the old dwelling house, which has already been moved once or twice, will soon have to be removed further back or torn down. Where we rode along in our conveyance, on the public road near this place, some three years ago, is now 150 feet out in the stream of the sweeping Mississippi."

The New Postage Stamps.—The N. Y. Tribune understands that the contractor, Mr. Nesbit, has a large number of the new stamped envelops for the Post-Office Department now ready for delivery. Mr. N., months ago, expended a large amount of money in erecting a commodious place, with steam-power, for the exclusive purpose of manufacturing these envelops. Some one hundred and fifty males and females were immediately employed to prosecute the work. The white and buff paper is of superior quality, and made expressly for this purpose, with water-lines having the letters P. O. D. U. S., being the initials of the Post-Office Department of the United States, which are as easily distinguished as if they were printed in ink. The sheets of paper are cut into envelop size by a cutting machine run by steam. They are then embossed with the likeness of General Washington; then stamped, on steam presses, with the various denominations of postages; then pass through the process for self-sealing, and finally are carefully examined, counted, and packed in large cases, ready for shipment. The operatives are principally females, and the contractor has spared neither pains nor expense in getting up this article in the handsomest style. Mr. Nesbit has adopted stringent rules for guarding the factory—the same as at the U. S. Mint. This is done to prevent forgeries or abstraction of the envelops, and under no circumstances are strangers admitted unless accompanied by himself or a trusty employé. The factory is also gaurded at night by watchmen. These envelops must eventually take the place of the stamps now used for the prepayment of letters, as they are far more convenient, and cost the purchaser about the same.

Grafting Grape Vines.—You can turn your thrifty wild grape vine to good account by grafting. Saw off the vine an inch or so below the surface of the ground. Then with a gimlet or small auger, just the size of the graft, bore one or more holes perpendicularly, or parallel with the grain, about two inches deep, in the top of the root sawn off, and into these insert the scions the full depth of the holes. Let the scions be of the last year's growth, well ripened, and about six inches in length, with a bud or eye at the top; they should be cut from the vine during the winter or early in the spring, before the sap gets in motion, and the operation should be performed before it is expected the sap will start, although it will usually succeed afterward if the top of the stock is well waxed. After inserting the scions, cover the wounds firmly with moist clay, up to the eye of the scions, and place a board so as to protect from washing by rain, till the leaves appear. This method is surer than cleft grafting. [Ohio Cult.

Stoneless Cherries.—Cherries without stones have been produced in France by the following method: In the spring, before the circulation of the sap, a young seedling cherry tree is split from the upper extremity down to the fork of its roots; then, by means of a piece of wood in the form of a spatula, the pith is carefully removed from the tree, in such a manner as to avoid any excoriation, or other injury; a knife is used only for commencing the split. Afterwards the two sections are brought together and tied with woolen, care being taken to close hermetically with clay the whole length of the cleft. The sap soon reünites the separated portions of the tree, and, two years afterwards, cherries are produced of the usual appearance, but instead of stones, there will only be small soft pellicks.

VARIETY.

Mark the laboring man, who breakfasts at six, and then walks perhaps two or three miles to his work. He is full of health, and a stranger to doctors. Mark, on the other hand, your clerk, who takes tea and toast at eight, and goes down to the store at nine, or half past. He is a pale, effeminate creature, full of sarsaparilla and patent medicine, and pills and things. What a pity it is that this class of people do not lay down the yardstick and the scissors, and take up the scythe or flail for a year or two. By remaining in their present occupation, they only help to fill up cemeteries, and that's about as miserable a use of humanity as you can name.

The philosophy which affects to teach us a contempt of money, does not run very deep; for, indeed, it ought to be still more clear to the philosopher than it is to ordinary men, that there are few things in the world of greater importance. And so manifold are the bearings of money upon the lives and character of mankind, that an insight which should search out the life of a man in his pecuniary relations, would penetrate into almost every cranny of his nature. He who knows, like St. Paul, both how to spare and how to abound, has a great knowledge.

"I served," says Jefferson, "with General Washington in the Legislature of Virginia, before the Revolution, and during it with Dr. Franklin in Congress. I never heard either of them speak ten minutes at a time, nor to any but the main point, which was to decide the question. They laid their shoulders to the great points, knowing that the little ones would follow of themselves."

In the Circuit Court of the United States, recently, the jury in the case of Earl E. Ryder vs. the Portsmouth, Saco and Portland Railroad Company, returned a verdict for the plaintiff, assessing damages at $6583 33. The action was brought for injuries occasioned by an accident on the road some 18 months since, whereby the plaintiff's spinal column was injured.

The Sabbath Recorder,

Published Weekly.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in Advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary, and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

The Sabbath-School Visitor,

Published Monthly.

Terms per Annum—Invariably in advance:

One copy	$ 25
Five copies to one address	1 00
Twelve copies to one address	2 00
Twenty copies to one address	3 00
Twenty-eight copies to one address	4 00
Forty copies to one address	5 00

The Seventh-day Baptist Memorial,

Published Quarterly.

Terms—$1 00 a Year, 25 Cents a Number.

Each number of the Memorial will contain a lithographic portrait of a Seventh-day Baptist preacher, together with a variety of historical, biographical, and statistical matter, designed to illustrate the rise, progress, and present condition of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Wood cuts of meeting-houses will be introduced from time to time in connection with the history of the churches.

☞ Orders and remittances for the above should be addressed to the General Agent, George B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

Postage.

The postage on the Sabbath Recorder is 13 cents a year in the State of New York, and 26 cents in any other part of the United States, payable quarterly or yearly in advance.

The postage on the Sabbath-School Visitor is 3 cents a year in the State of New York, and 6 cents in any other part of the United States, payable in advance.

The postage on the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial is 2 cents a year in any part of the United States when paid in advance, or 4 cents a year when not paid in advance.

Geo. B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

Liabilities of those who take Periodicals.

The laws declare that any person to whom a Periodical is sent, is responsible for payment, if he receives the paper, or makes use of it, even if he has never subscribed for it, or has ordered it to be stopped. His duty in such a case is not to take the paper from the office or person with whom the paper is left, but to notify the Publisher that he does not wish for it.

If papers are sent to a post-office, store or tavern, or other place of deposit, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the postmaster, store, or tavern-keeper, &c., is responsible for the payment until he returns the papers, or gives notice to the Publisher that they are lying dead in the office.
